reason whereof the inheritaunce of Castell(because that kingdoms be not partible) discended to Lady Jane her eldest daughter by king Fardinãdo,the which was maried to Philip Archduke of Austrich & Burgoyne,and Erle of Flaunders. Which kingdome he obtayned by hys wife, and had the possession of the same, and was named, reputed, and taken,as king of Castell and Lyon. Wherefore the yere folowyng, about the first day of January,hauyng a great nauy prepared, he sayled out of Flaunders with his wife towarde Spaine,but he had sayled no great way before that a sore tempest, by reason of contrariety of windes sodainly arose,so that the whole nauy was tossed & chased with the waues,and sodaine sourges. In so much the winde hauyng the maistry,dispersed & seperated the ships asunder into diuers places on the coast of England. The kinges ship with two other vesselles were blowen by tempest on the West part of the realme to the porte of Weymouth in Dorsetshire. Then king Philip which was not expert, and had not frequented the Seas before, beyng wery ed and vnquieted both in minde and bodie, enteryng the ship boate to refreshe and repose himselfe a little,came a land contrary to the mynd of his counsaile and Capitaynes, which forsaw and knew well that the same landyng should be the occasion of lenger taryng there. When it was knowen that straunge shippes were arriued, there came thether a great number aswell of Noble men, as of rurall persons that dwelleth about that coast, to repulse and beate away him if he were their enemie. But when they perceyued he was their friend and louer, and driuen thether by force of weather, Sir Thomas Trenchard knight, the chiefe of that companie, went to Philip king of Castell with all humanitie and lowlinesse,inuityng and desyryng him (if he woulde so vouchsafe) to visite his Manor and Mancion, which was euen nighe at hande, trustyng thereby to haue great thankes of the king his maister, if he could protract and cause him to tarye there, vntill such tyme as king Henry were certifyed of his arriuall,to whom with all diligent celeritie, he sent diuers postes to notifie to his grace of king Philips landyng. This rumor beyng farther blowne abrode of this straũge Princes commyng, in a short space there assembled together a great multitude of people all a long the sea coast. Andamong other there came first Sir John Carew with a goodly band of picked men. Which Sir John and Sir Thomas Trenchard entreated the king of Castell, not to depart vntill such tyme as he had spoken with king Henry his louyng and faythfull friend and allye, assuryng him that he would repayre thether within two or three daies at the most. King Philip excused himselfe by the necessitie of his weightie enterprice and importunate cause, affirmyng that long taryng in matters of grauitie and doubtfull, ought to be excluded: wherefore he alleged that protractyng of tyme might turne him to great preiudice, denyng at the first to expect and tary the commyng of the king of England: but yet being perswaded by reason in himselfe, that he might be let and interrupted, if he woulde proffer once to go abrode to his shippes againe,at their gentle desyre and louyng contemplation, assented to their humble petition and request.

When king Henry was informed of his landyng, he was replenished with an exceeding gladnesse, partly for to renue the olde familiaritie and acquaintaunce, which they vsed at their last meeting, and partly for that he trusted that hys landing in England should turne to his profite and commo-

dutie. Therfore first he wrote many and dyuers letters to syr John Carew, and syr Thomas Trenchard, wylling and warnyng them withall kindnesse of humanitie to entertayne the king of Castell, till he in person approched in some place meete and conuenient for the enterviewyng and entertayning of so noble a personage. Beside this he sent the Erle of Arundell with manye Lordes and knights to accompany and attend vpon him. Which Erle, according to the kinges letters receaued him with three hundred horses all by Torche light to the great admiration of all the straungers.

King Phylip seyng no remedie, but that he must needes tarie and abyde, would no lenger gase after king Henrys comming, but tooke hys tourney towardes Wyndsore Castell where the king laye. And fyue Myle from Wyndsore, the Prince of Wales accompanyed with fiue Erles and dyuers Lordes and knightes, and other to the number of fyue hundred persons, most gorgeously appareled and richely mounted, receaued him after the most honorablest fashion of entertaynment. And within halfe a myle of Wyndsore, the king accompanied with the Duke of Buckyngham, and a great part of the Nobilitie of hys realme, saluted and welcommed him, and so conueyed him to the Castel of Wyndsore, where beside many triumphes & pastimes shewed, he was made companion of the noble order of the Garter. After him came to Wyndsore hys wyfe Queene Jane, sister to the Princes Dowager, late wyfe to Prince Arthur. And after they two had concluded and renouate their olde league, and made a perpetuall peace and continuall amitie together: king Henry desired him to haue Edmond de la poole Erle of Suffolke his rebell to be deliuered into his handes and possession. To whome the king of Castell aunswered awhyle, that he was not within hys rule or dominion, and therefore it laye not in his power to render or deliuer hym. Although he considered it to be a heynous and great offence to be the occasion and author of the death of his guest, which came to him for succour and was receaued vnder his protection and defence, yet when he perceaued that neyther excuse, nor yet reasonable argument could be accepted or allowed of king Henry (which promised faythfully of hys awne offer to pardon, Edmond de la poole, of all paynes and executions of death) he promised and graunted to doe and accomplishe all king Henries desyre and request: And so incontinent caused the sayd Edmond secretly to be sent for. After this king Henry entending to protract the time till he might possesse his praye, which he sore desired, conueyed the king of Castell vnto the Citie of London, that he might see the head Citie of his realme, and there led him from Baynards Castell by Chepe to Barkyng, and so returned by Watling streete agayne, during which time there was shot a wonderfull peale of Gonnes out of the Tower, into the which he would not enter, because (as you haue heard before) he had auowed not to enter the fortresse of any forrein Prince, in the which a garison was maynteyned: And there taryng a little space, returned back with him. Then from London the king brought him to Richemonde, where were many notable feates of armes proued both at the tylt and at the tourney and at the barriers.

Edmond de la poole sent back agayne into England and committed to the Tower.

In the meane season, Edmond de la poole which euer feared and mistrusted, that the arryuing in Englande of king Phylip should be his fatall ende and finall destruction, perceyuing well that there was no farther hope to be had in foreyn princes and potentates, and truſtyng that after his lyfe to him once graunted, that king Henry would briefely ſet him at libertie and freedome, was in maner content to returne agayne into his native Countrie, caſting in his minde farther, that if his hope and truſt were defrauded and refelled, yet at the laſt he was ſure to ende his lyfe, and be buried in the Countrie, where he firſt entred into this variable worlde.

When all pactes and couenaunts betweene the kings of Englande and Caſtell were appointed, couenaunted and agreed: King Philip tooke hys leaue of king Henry, rendering to him moſt heartie thankes for his highe cheere and princely entertaynement. And beyng accompanyed with diuers Lordes of Englande, came to the Citie of Exceſter, and ſo to Fulmouth in Cornewale, and there toke his ſhip and ſayled into Spaine, where he ſhortly beyng taken with a ſodayne diſeaſe, departed out of thys tranſitorie lyfe, beyng then but. xxx. yeres of age. He had by hys wyfe Queene Jane, ſixe children, two men children, Charles and Ferdinand, and foure daughters, Eleanor, Iſabell, Marie and Katherin. He was a man of ſtature conuenient, of countenaunce amiable and louely, of bodye ſomewhat craſſe and corpulent, quick wytted, bold and hardie ſtomacked. Thys tempeſt that the king of Caſtell had, was wonderfull ſtraunge to many men, becauſe the violencie of the winde had blowne downe an Egle of Braſſe, beyng ſet to ſhewe and manifeſt on which part the winde blew, for a pynnacle or ſpire of Paules Church. And in the fallyng the ſame Egle brake, and battered another Egle that was ſet vp for a ſigne at a Tauerne doore in Chepeſide. And hereupon, men that were ſtudious of ſtraunge tokens and mõſtruous wonders, did take an opinion that the Emperour Maximilian, which at that time gaue an Egle in his armes, ſhould haue a great loſſe, which ſo happened in deede: For he loſt his onely begotten ſonne Philip, newely called to the kingdome of Caſtell.

The diſcription of king Philip.

Alſo, ſhortly after the departyng of king Philip, the king of Englande began to ſuſpect Sir George Neuell Lorde of Burgeyney, and Sir Thomas Greene, of Greenes Norton knight, that they were confedered fautors, and partakers, in the beginnyng with Edmond de la Poole; and ſo vpon this ſuſpicion, they were commaunded to the Tower. But ſhortly after when they had beene tryed and purged of that ſuſpicion and cryme, he commaunded them both to be ſet at libertie. But Sir Thomas Greene fell ſicke before, and continued in the Tower in hope to be reſtored aſwell to his helth, as he was to his libertie, and there dyed. The Lorde of Burgeyny for hys modeſtie, wit, and goodneſſe (becauſe the king founde him like himſelfe) alwayes true, faythfull, and conſtant, was of his ſouereigne Lorde more eſteemed, fauoured and regarded then he was before.

In this yere alſo Sir Thomas Kneeſworth Maior of London at hys owne charges builded the Conduyt at Biſhopſgate. And alſo he gaue to the companie of the Fiſhmongers certeyne tenementes, for the which they are bound to finde foure ſcholers, whereof two to be in Cambridge, and two to be in Oxforde, and eyther of them to haue foure pounde a yere for their exhibition. &c.

After this, the king hauyng peace aſwell with forreyn Princes, for the terme of three yeres, as diſburdened and purifyed of all domeſticall ſedi- 1506 22 cion, began to be diseased with a certeine infirmitie and weakenesse of bodie, which thrise in the yere, but specially in the spring tyme sore vexed and tormented him. And because for the most part the harme & euill that chaunceth to the Prince, is parted and communicate to his subiects and people, the olde sweatyng disease whereof you heard before amongest the Commons of the realme, came againe. Howbeit by the reason of the remedie that was inuented by the death of many a creature in the beginnyng, it did lesse hurt and displeasure to the people at this tyme then it did before. But nowe the third plague egall with the pestilence ensued by the worckyng of the Maisters of the forfeytures, by the king appoynted as I shewed you before. By whose meanes many a riche and welthie person, by the extremitie of the lawes of the realme, were condemned and brought to miserie.

A pestilent plague.

This matter (sayth Hall) is as wonderfull to be heard, as pitifull and miserable to be done, and yet it is called the lawe, where as it is rather pernerse abuse and disorder of a lawe: politiquely at the beginnyng inuented to cause the people the sooner to confirme themselues to suche as demaunde their right of them, but craftily practised to the vtter confusion of many by vntrue officers. For if a man put his aduersarie in suyte before the Iudges, of which complaint or action he neyther thinketh nor hath knowlege, if he appere not at ỹ last callyng of the exigent, which is called in a shire where he neuer came (for how can he appere, if he be ignorant of the prosecution of the cause, and dwell two hundreth myles from that place) then doth hee forfeyte all his substaunce and moueables, and his bodie to captiuitie as an enemie and rebell to the lawes of his Country. And yet the Prince shall enioy the goodes so confiscate, and the partie complaynaunt or plaintife that is wronged recouereth not one myte, and yet loseth both his paine and costes. And all such persons that be so condempned & adiudged, be called outlawes, that is depriued of all lawes of the lande, to the which he was by the custome of the Countrie inheritable. These outlawries, olde recognisances of the peace and good abering, escapes, ryottes and innumerable statutes penall, were put in execution and called vpon by Empson and Dudley, so that euery man both of the spiritualtie and temporaltie, hauing eyther land or substance was called to this plucking banket, according to the Psalmist saiyng, all declyned and fell together, and no man although he were neuer so cleere and guiltlesse, in conclusion durst auenture a tryall, seing the experience of them that passed before. For these commissioners had such a garde of false periured persons apperteyning to them, which were by their commaundements empaneled on euery quest, that the king was sure to wynne whosoeuer lost. Learned men in the lawe, when they were requyred of their aduise, would say, to agree is the best counsayle that I can geue you. By this vndue meanes, these persons filled the kinges Cofers and enryched themselues. And at this vnreasonable and extort doings, all sortes and degrees of men from the highest to the lowest murmured, grudged and at the last cryed out: But the good king in his last dayes considered and pardoned his poore subiectes of such vncharitable yokes and ponderous burdens as they were laden withall, as after shall appere.

Outlawryes

In this season Alexander Bysshop of Rome departed out of this world, and for him was elected Fraunces borne Senes, Nephew to Pius the second, cond, and was called Pius the thirde, whome king Henry had made a little before, Proctour for his realme in the Court of Rome. The king beyng glad of his high promotion and dignitie, sent syr Gylbert Talbot knight, Richard Bere Abbot of Glascenburie, and Doctor Robert Sherborne Deane of Paules, to declare to him what gladnesse entered into the kinges heart, when he heard tell of his high preferment and honor. But this Bishop Pius did not tary the gratulations of these Ambassadors, for within a moneth after that he was installed, he rendered his debt to nature, hauing final pleasure of his promotion. At this time also died Giles, Lord Dawbeney, the kings chief Chamberleyn, whose office Charles bastarde sonne of Henry last Duke of Sommerset occupied and enioyed, a man of a good wit & great experience.

The death of Giles Lorde Daubeney.

And this yere about Christmasse the Bakers house in Warwicke Lane in London was brent, the which fyre came so sodeinly, and brent so feruently that the Maistresse of the house beyng a widdow with two women seruants were therein brent.

Sone after, the king caused Guy Ubald Duke of Urbine to be elected knight of the order of the Garter, a noble warriour, and in the Greke and Latin tongues excellently learned. And this order and dignitie the Duke desired instantlye to haue, that he might be equiualent in all degrees of honour and nobilitie with his Father, duke Frederick a Prince in his time of high renowne and estimation, which was receaued and chosen into that order by kyng Edward the fourth. And because it was noysed that July the seconde, a Januway borne, was after ỳ death of Pius, elected to be Bishop of Rome. The kyng entending to stop two gaps with one bush, sent Syr Gilbert Talbot and the other two Ambassadours, principally to bishop July, and by them sent also to the Duke of Urbyne, the whole habite & coller of the noble order of the Gartier. When Duke Guy was reuested with the habite, and had taken his oth, according to the statutes of the order: He sent syr Balthaser de Castelio knight a Mantuan borne, his Oratour to kyng Henry, which was for him enstalled, according to the ordinaunces of that famous order. 1507 23

While these things were in doing, Lewys the French king mistrusting that he should neuer haue mã child, maried his eldest daughter Lady Claude to Fraunces de Ualoys, Dolphyn of Uien and Duke of Angulesme: which Lady was promysed a litle before to Charles the king of Castel. When king Henrye knew of this, he thought best to marrye hys daughter Ladye Marye to this Charles kyng of Castell, being almost both of one age, and therefore Ambassadors were sent to and fro, and at the last, the mariage was concluded and cõfirmed by the meanes of the Bishop of Winchester, chiefe Ambassador for the king at Calleyce, and so the Lady Mary being of the age of .x. yeares, was promised to king Charles. For cõclusion of which marriage, the Lord of Barow, and diuers great Ambassadours were sent into England from the Emperour Maximilian, which had great rewardes and returned.

Nowe approched the end and terme of the three yeres of peace that I spake of before, at which tyme kyng Henrie thought his fatall daye to be at hand: For his sickneslle encreased daylie more and more, so that he might easilye perceaue that death was not far of tarying hys praye: Therefore lyke a good Prince, desiring to exhibite some gratuitie to his people that he might be had in memory after his discease, graunted of his great liberalitie a gene-

But becauſe murtherers and theeues were not only offenders to him, but alſo to other, he excepted them and ſome other out of his pardon. He payed alſo the fees of all priſoners in the Gayles in and about London, abidyng there onely for that dutie. He payed alſo the dettes of all ſuch perſons as laye in the Counters of London, or Ludgate for. xl. ſhillynges and vnder, and ſome he relieued that were condemned in ten pound. For this his goodneſſe and pitie ſhewed to his people, beyng ſore vexed with his inquiſitors, pollers and promoters, generall Proceſſion was had dayly in euery Citie and pariſhe, to pray to almightie God, for the reſtoryng of his health, with long continuance of the ſame. Henry Prince of Wales, which after him ſucceded, and was king, Ladie Margaret Queene of Scots, & Ladie Mary promiſed to Charles king of Caſtell. He was a man of bodie but leane and ſpare, albeit mightie and ſtrong therwith, of perſonage and ſtature, ſomewhat higher then the meane ſort of men be, of a wonderfull beautie and fayre complexion, of countinance mery and ſmilyng, eſpecially in his communication, his eyes gray, hys teeth ſingle, and heare thinne, of wit in all thinges quicke and prompt, of a princely ſtomacke, and haute courage. In great perilles, doubtfull affayres and matters of waighty importaunce, ſupernaturall, and in maner deuine, for ſuch thinges as he went about, he did them aduiſedly, and not without great deliberation and breathing, to the entent that amongſt all men, his wit and prudence might be noted & regarded. For he was not ignorant that his actes & doings were ſpecially noted and marked with the eies of many a perſon: and therefore a Prince ought as farre to excell and ſurmount all meane perſonages in wiſedome and policie, as he precelleth other in eſtate and dignitie. For what man will geue credite or regarde to him, whome he hath proued to be light, wilde, and laſciuious of condicions? Beſydes this, he was ſober, moderate, honeſt, affable, curteous, bounteous, ſo much abhorred pride and arrogancie, that he was euer ſharpe and quicke to them, which were noted or ſpotted with that cryme. And there was no man with him, being neuer ſo much in his fauour, or hauyng neuer ſo much authoritie, that eyther durſt or could do any thing as his awne phantaſie did ſerue him, without the conſent and agreement of other. What ſhall I ſay more? Although his mother were neuer ſo wiſe (as ſhe was both wittie and wiſe) yet her will was brideled, and her doynges reſtrayned. And this regiment he ſayde he kept, to the entent that he worthily might be called a king, whoſe office is to rule & not to be ruled of other. He was alſo an indifferent & ſure Juſticier, by the which one thing, he allured to him the heartes of many people, becauſe they liued quietly and in reſt out of all oppreſſion and moleſtation of the Nobilitie and riche perſonnes. And to this ſeuerity of his was ioyned and annexed a certeyn mercifull pittie, which he did often ſhewe to ſuch as had offended, and by his lawes were hindred and mered: for ſuch of his ſubiectes as were fyned or amerced by his Iuſtices to their great impouerifhyng, he at one time or another did helpe relieue, and ſet forward: wherby it appered that he would haue the ſame penalties for other offences and crimes reuiued and ſtirred vp againe, which was a plaine argument that he did vſe his rigour onely (as he ſayde himſelfe) to bring lowe, and abate the high ſtomacks of the wilde people, norifhed and brought vp in ſeditious factions, and ciuill rebellions, and not for the greedy deſyre of richeſſe, or hunger of money, although ſuch as were afflicted would crie out, and ſay, that it was done more for the deſire of gaine and profite, then for any prudent pollicie, or pollitike prouiſion.

Surely, this good and modeſt Prince did not deuour and conſume the ſubſtaunce and ryches of his realme, for he by his high pollicie, meruaylouſly enriched his realme and himſelfe, and yet left his ſubiectes in high welth and proſperitie. The proofe is whereof manifeſtly apparant by the great aboundaunce of gold & ſiluer, yerely brought into this realme, both in plate, money and bullion, by Marchaunts paſſyng and repaſſyng out and into this realme with Marchaundiſe. To whom he himſelfe of his awne goodneſſe lent money largely without any gaine or profite, to the entent that Marchandiſe beyng of all craftes the chiefe arte, and to all men, both moſt profitable and neceſſarie, might be the more plentifuller vſed, haunted, and employed in hys realmes and dominions. And ſo this king liuyng all his tyme in the fauour of Fortune, in high honour, riches and glory, and for his noble actes and prudent pollicies, worthie to be regeſtred in the booke of fame, gaue vp his ghoſt at the laſt, which vndoubtedly is aſcended into the celeſtiall mancion, where he hath the ſure fruition of the Godhead, & the ioye that is prepared for ſuch as ſhall ſit on the right hande of our ſauiour, euer world without ende.

About thys time (ſayth Polydore) knowledge of good letters, as well of the Latyne as of the Greeke by contynuall warres beyng fore decayed in Italy, encreaſed greatly in Germany, Fraunce and Scotlande, in ſo much (ſayth he) that the Germaynes, who were counted in time paſt but the meaneſt learned men, are now as may appere by their writyngs moſt excellent. And for the furtheraunce and encreaſe of learning, about this time Margaret Counteſſe of Richemond and Darby and mother vnto thys king Henry the ſeuenth, a woman of moſt verteous lyfe, at the motion of Iohn Fiſher ſometime Biſhop of Rocheſter builded two Colleges in Cambridge, the one called Chriſtes College, the other Saint Iohn Euangeliſtes, and indued the ſame with goodly poſſeſſions for the maintenaunce of learning. And in the ſame Vniuerſitie alſo not long before, Iohn Alcok Biſhop of Ely buylded a College, and named the ſame Ieſus College.

And here, although in this Chronicle in diuers places there is mention made of the foundation of ſundrie Colleges both in Cambridge and Oxford, yet for as much as I was by my friend aſſerteyned of the foundation of all the ſeuerall Colleges in Oxford, I thought it beſt to place them here altogether, minding to doe the lyke for Cambridge when I ſhall haue the true knowlege of the Colleges of the ſame.

Theſe graue and wiſe Counſaylors fearing leaſt that great and infinite aboundance of welth, might be a harme vnto the good nature of their young king, for vnto no king at any time before, was left greater or the like riches aſwell of readye coyne as alſo in iewels and moueables as was left vnto hym. And therefore the aforeſayd counſaylors very prudently and diligently traueyled ſo with hym, that they prouoked him to be preſent with them and to be priuie of their counſailes and deuiſes, and ſo dayly acquainted him with the politique affayres of the realme, that by litle and litle he of his owne accord applyed hym ſelfe to rule and gouerne, the which at the firſt he ſemed vtterly to abhorre, as the yong and vntamed Ore refuſeth the yoke.

Then the sayd Counsaylors traueyled with great care to put in execucion the last will and testament of king Henrie deceased. And first of all, the kings grace by his proclamation made the .xxv. daye of Apryll ratefied & confirmed all the pardons graunted by his father, & also pardoned all persons that were then in sute for any offence whatsoeuer it was, treason, murder, and felonye except. And farther in the sayd proclamation was contayned, that if any man had sustayned iniurye or losse of goodes by the Commissioners before appoynted, as appereth in the .xix. yere of king Henry the seuenth, that he should make his humble supplication vnto the kings grace, and therin expresse their griefe, and he was readye not only to heare them, but also to cause satisfaction to be made. When this proclamation was published and knowne abroad, all such from whome any thing had bene exacted or taken, whether it were by right or wrong, spedily came vnto the Court, and euery man alleaged and shewed iust occasion that they had to complayne. But the Counsayle examyned and tryed their causes, and such as they found to be manifestly & openly iniured, to them they made due restitution. The which thing being blowne and bruted amongst the cõmon people, lord how they resorted in great flocks and heapes, & rushed into the court with the rest, whether they had bene iustly punished or not, and they also with horrible & great exclamation cryed out vpon the Commissioners, yea and many of them that most exclaymed were such as had bene touched nothing at all. But the rage and crye of the people was so grieuous against the Commissioners, whose names were Richarde Empson knight and Edmond Dudley Esquier, that the Counsaile to ease and quiet the rage of the people were enforsed to apprehend and commit to the Tower of London the aforesayd Empson and Dudley, and being called before the Counsaile and other the iustices, where they (as Polidor saith) being both learned in the lawes of the realme, pleaded for themselues, namelye syr Richard Empson which was the elder, who said, as followeth. I am certayn right honorable, you are not ignorant how expedient & profitable vnto mans life be good and wholsome lawes, without the which neyther private house may be mayntayned, nor publyque weale duely and orderly gouerned. Euen those lawes among vs by the ouersight and negligence of Magistrats, partlye were depraued, and now in some part abrogate and cleane out of memorie, the which euill encreasing daylie more and more, king Henrie the. viij. (now deceassed) a most prudent and politique prince (as ye all know) endeuored to redresse, who vnto vs committed the charge to see, and prouide that the common and accustomed lawes might be maintayned and executed, and such as were depraued and out of vse might be reduced and restored into their pristinate state: And that such persones as had violated & transgressed any of them, should suffer condigne and worthie punishement: We therfore as faithfully and vprightly as we could haue according to oure commission executed our office trulie vnto the great commoditie of the publique weale: Wherfore we most humbly beseech your Honours that of your goodnesse and loue of iustice, ye will vouchsafe to determine no grieuous or cruell sentence against vs, but rather counsaile and conclude howe thankefully to recompence and requite our great trauayle and paynes.

Richard Empson. Edmond Dudley.

The sayng of Richarde Empson.

These their sayings vnto many that were wise, vertuous and discrete semed to be very good and right, but vnto other and that vnto the greatest number,

number, who ſuppoſed that the examination and execution of lawes beyng done through auerice and coueteouſneſſe and for filthye deſier of gayne, they iudged that euen they by putting in execucion with extremytie the lawes to the loſſe of many an honeſt mans goodes, ſhould now be recompenſed with the loſſe of their heades, who within three dayes after were beheadded at the Tower hill, but their bodies with their heades were buried, that is to ſay, Richard Empſon at the White Friers, and Edmond Dudley at the Blacke Friers in London aforeſaid.

Empſon and Dudley beheadded.

And immediatly after the execucion of the aforeſaid perſons there were (ſaith Polidor) by reaſon of the exclamation of the people apprehended and take a great number of ſuch as had geuen for their (aboue welth and commoditie) their ſpeciall attendaunce vpon the aforeſayd Commiſſioners, in the informyng and promotyng of many honeſt mens verations (commonly called Promoters) and they were committed to ſundrie Priſons, and many of them ſet on the Pillory, and other had papers ſet on their heades, and ſo caryed throughout the Citie of London, and againe committed to priſon, where miſerably many of them ended their liues. And ſome other of them were conſtrayned to pay moſt grieuous fynes, and for none habilitie to paye the ſame, were committed and condempned to perpetuall priſon.

Promoters.

Maiſter Hall in his Chronicle nameth diuers of the ſayde Promoters, and for that to their infamie, I wiſhe them perpetuall memory, I will here make mencion of Halles words. After (ſaith he) the apprehenſion of Empſon, and Dudley, there were diuers Promoters apprehended, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wright, Symſon, and Stocton, and diuers other, of the which the moſt part ware papers, and ſtood on the Pillory: But (ſaith he) the craftieſt knaue of them all (meanyng they were knaues all) called John Baptiſt Brimalde, eſcaped and went to Weſtminſter, and there tocke Sanctuary.

Promoters ſet on the Pillory.

Nowe all thinges beyng in a redineſſe for the buriall and funerall of king Henry the ſeuenth, he was the .xij. day of May with all ſolemnitie buryed at Weſtminſter in the Chapell that he himſelfe had buylded, which is a moſt ſumptuous and princely peece of worke.

King Henry the ſeuenth buried at Weſtminſter.

When the funeralles of king Henry the ſeuenth was finiſhed, then was great preparation made for the coronation of king Henry the eight, the which was appoynted to be done on Midſommer day nert enſuyng. During which tyme the king was moued by ſome of his Counſayle, that it ſhould be honourable and profitable to his Realme, to take to wife Ladie Katheryn, late wife to Prince Arthur his brother diſſeaſed, leaſt ſhe hauyng ſo great a dowry, might marry out of the realme, which ſhould be vnprofitable vnto him: By reaſon of which motion, the king being young, & not vnderſtanding the law of God, eſpouſed the ſayd Lady Katheryn the thirde day of June, the which mariage was diſpenced with by Pope July, at the requeſt of her father king Ferdinando (and as Hall ſayth) contrarye to the opinion of all the Cardinals of Rome that were deuines. This mariage of the brothers wife was much murmured againſt in the beginnyng, and euer more and more ſearched out by learnyng and Scripture, ſo that at the laſt by the determination of the beſt vniuerſities in Chriſtendome, it was adiudged deteſtable and plaine contrary to Goddes lawe, as ſhall be ſhewed after .xx. yeres.

The coronation of king Henrie and Queene Katherin.

Nowe was come the tyme of the coronation, wherefore king Henrye and his wife Queene Katheryn were accordyng to the sacred obseruance and auncient custome, annoynted and crowned by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury at Westminster the. xxiiij. day of June.

Margaret Countesse of Richemond dead.

During the tyme that this coronacion with noble triumphes and goodly shewes solempnized to the great reioisyng of all men, a sodeyne occasion of sorrow happened, as often tymes it commeth in experience that sweete and delicate meate in the ende is tempered with sowre sawce, for at this tyme Margaret Countesse of Richemonde and Darbye, Grandmother vnto the king ended her life, by whose death the publique weale was greatly endammaged, for she beyng a woman of singuler wisdome and policie, and also of most vertuous life, perceiuyng that the king by reason of his youthfull and lustie yeres could not execute and minister his office and function, did from the beginnyng so prouide and studie at all tymes that she brought to passe that suche men as were the worthiest and of most integritie and godlinesse was aduaunced to highest auctoritie and bare the chiefest sway in the ministration of the causes of the publique weale: And where before least the publique weale shoulde sustaine detriment, or by any meanes goto wracke, the same was guided and gouerned by the aduice of many, as afore sayde: But nowe the administration therof was committed only vnto two, that is to say, Richard Bishop of Winchester, & Thomas Erle of Surrey, betwene whom was secret grudges, and priuie malice, the which contencion of auctoritie, did dayly more and more encrease, for the studies and affections of these two were diuers and contrary. The Bishop of Winchester as (sayth Polidor) contented himselfe with his awne possessions, and therefore endeuored the more earnestly to the seruice of the common weale: But the Erle (sayth he) sought to come to higher estate, and therefore applyed and studied to please the king, more for preferment sake, then for the zeale he bare to the common weale. But the Bishop beyng a man of great wisedome, although he had no good opinion of the Erle, yet perceiuyng him to be greatly beloued and fauoured of the king, did dissemble and bare himselfe so warely, that nothing appered outward, whatsoeuer was thought inwarde. The Erle in wisdome beyng nothing inferiour vnto the Bishop, did in like maner dissemble hys griefe towardes the Bishop. Howbeit at the length by the trauaile of the graue and worthie Counsaylor Sir Thomas Louell, all the olde Counsaylors were againe restored and placed in good and louyng order, and the common weale well gouerned.

John Colet Deane of Paules.

In this tyme also the ryght famous and learned deuine John Colet Deane of Paules Church in London (the sonne of Henry Colet Mercer and late Maior of London) of his awne great costes and charges buylded in the East end of Paules Churchyard in the sayd Citie one free Grammer schoole, with one Maister and Vsher for the education and bringing vp of youth in learning, and builded also two faire Tenements ioyning to the said Schoole for the sayd Maister and Vsher to inhabite in, and endued them with goodlie pencions, and committed the charge and ouersight of the good gouernment and continuaunce of the sayd Schoole vnto the Maysters and Wardeines of the worshipfull companye of the Mercers for the time being to be ordered and kept according to such ordinances and statutes as he had drawne for the good good gouernment of the ſame, which ſayde company of the Mercers haue to their great prayſe hetherto ordered the ſame to Gods high honor and to the benefite of the common weale and to the well bringing vp of many an honeſt pore mans child. This man in his time was a great and diligent Preacher of Gods bleſſed worde and did in thoſe dayes much reprehend and rebuke the ſlouthfulneſſe of the Cleargie, and he was the firſt in his time that taught to the people the Articles of their fayth and the Commaundements of almighty God, and the Lords prayer in Engliſh, for the which he was not at that time well thought of by ſundry of the Biſhops and Cleargye, who then fauored in the common people ignoraunce better then knowledge.

This yere Henrie the firſt ſonne of king Henrye was borne at Richemond vpon Newyeres daye to the great reioyſing and comfort of the whole realme, for the ioye and honour of whoſe birth great fyers were made and diuers veſſels of wine ſet in the ſtretes of London for ſuch as would taſte thereof. And that at the ſame time were kept noble and triumphant Juſtes and ſundry other paſtimes, but the .xxij. daye of Februarie next folowing God called to his mercye the ſayd chylde to the great heauineſſe of the kyng and Queene, and all the realme. Notwithſtandyng the king like a wiſe Prince toke it with much quietneſſe, and the rather to comfort the Queene: But the Queene like a naturall woman made much lamentation.

2 Henry the firſt borne ſon of king Henry the eight.

This yere in Februarie came from king Ferdinando the kinges father in law, and king of Aragon and Caſtell, certain Ambaſſadours, which made requeſt to the king: on the behalfe of the king their maiſter, to haue an ayde of .xv. hundred Archers, with valiaunt Capitaynes to gouerne and conduyt them, for his entent was to make warre on the Moores beyng Infidelles, and enemies vnto Chriſtes faith. The king and his Counſaile heeryng this requeſt, thought it much honourable to ayde a Chriſtian Prince, (and in eſpeciall his friend and fatherinlawe) agaynſt the enemyes of Chriſtes lawe, gently graunted them their requeſt.

Ambaſſadors from king Ferdinando.

When tidyngs was ſpread in the Court of this iourney againſt the Infidelles, the Lord Thomas Darcey, knight of the order of the Garter made humble ſute to the king to be Capitaine generall of that crewe or armie. The king and his Counſaile for his great valiauntneſſe and approued wiſedome, graunted his requeſt. And many other Lordes and knightes made ſute to be in the ſame iourney: But the king aunſwered them that he would retaine them ſtill with him for other greater purpoſes. There were appoynted at this tyme to go with the Lorde Darcye, Lorde Anthony Gray, brother to the Marques Dorcet, Henry Guylford, Weſton Browne, William Sydney, Eſquiers of the kinges houſe, Sir Roger Haſtyngs, Sir Raufe Elderkare and diuers other Gentlemen to be Capitaynes. The Lorde Darcy and all the other Capitaynes tooke their leaue of the king, and went into their coũtryes to prouide for all thinges meete and neceſſary for the voyage.

The king at this tyme beyng luſtie, yong, and couragious, greatly delighted in feates of chiualrie, inſomuch that he made a chalenge of Juſtes agaynſt all commers to be proclaymed at his Manor of Grenewich to be holden there the three firſt dayes of May then next enſuyng, which noble courage all yong perſons highly prayſed: But the auncient fathers much doubted conſideryng the tender youth of the King, and diuers chaunces and miſ-

3 The Lorde Darcye is sent into Spaine with an armye to the king of Aragon.

The Lorde Darcie and other appointed to the voyage afoꝛesaide made suche diligence that they and all their people were readie at Plymmoth by the middest of Maye, and there mustered their souldyours beꝛoze the Lorde Brooke and other the kings commissioners, the sayde Lorde Darcie as Capitayne generall oꝛdeyned foꝛ his Pꝛouost Marshall, Henry Guylfoꝛd Esquire, a lustie yong man and welbeloued of the king. Now when the winde serued to their purpose they passed to the sea with foure ships royall, and the wether so fauoured them that they arryued within ten dayes next folowyng beyng the first day of June, at the Poꝛt of Kales in Southspayne, and immediatly the Lorde Darcie dispatched to the king of Arragon two Gentlemen called John Bartholomew and Wylliam Symond, with letters to certefie the king of their arriuall, and what paine they had taken to come into his Countrie, in fulfilling the king their maisters commaundement. The messengers did so much that they came vnto the king beside the Citie of Ciuill, where he then lay & declared vnto him how the Lord Darcie by the king their maisters appointment, was come thether with.xvj.hundzed Archers, accoꝛdyng to the sayde king of Arragons request, and laye still at Kales to knowe his pleasure. The king of Arragon aunswered them gentlye, that the Lorde Darcie and all the other that were come from his most best beloued sonne were welcome, and hartely thanked them of their paynes, and pꝛayed the messengers to returne to their Capitayne, shewyng him that the king in all hast would send his counsayle vnto him, and so they departed from the king, and made repoꝛt to the Lorde Darcie, which kept his ship in great estate and would not land, but onely suffred such as were sick and feeble, and fewe other to go a land. And those English that went a lande fell to dꝛinking and were scarce maisters of themselues, some ranne to the stewes, some brake hedges and spoyled Oꝛchardes and Vyneyardes, and did many other outrageous dedes: wheꝛfoꝛe the chiefe of the towne of Kales came to complayne to the Lorde Darcie in his ship, which sent foꝛth his pꝛouost Marshall, who with much a doe brought them agayne on boꝛd to their ships.

The next daye folowyng beyng Saturday, a Bychop and other of the kings counsayle arryued at Kales and there aboade vntill Wednesday nert folowyng, at which day the Lord Darcie tooke lande, and was honoꝛably receaued of the king of Arragons counsayle, and on the moꝛrow highly feasted both at dinner and supper. And after supper the Bishop declared the king of Arragons pleasure saiyng: my Lorde Capitayne, the king my maister in most humble wise geueth you thankes foꝛ your great paines and trauaile, as much as though he pꝛoceeded in his pꝛetended enterpꝛise: But he with the aduise of his counsayle circumspectly considering the suretie of his awne realmes and dominions, hath perfite knowlege that his aduersarie of Fraunce, pꝛepareth to inuade his Countries in his absence: wheꝛefoꝛe he entending not to leaue his realmes voyde of men and ships (which might be a great comfoꝛt to his enemies to inuade) hath theꝛefoꝛe taken an abstinence of warre with the Moores vntill another time.

Well sayde the Lorde Darcie, sith it is fully concluded that we shall doe no seruice to your maister, we may not saye against his determination, considering that we were sent to him: But surely it is against my heart, which euer hath desired to fight against Gods enemies: But with your conclusion, I and all mine must be content.

You doe as you should doe, sayde the Bishop, and the king my maister geueth lyke thankes to the king his sonne, and to you all as though he had proceeded on his iourney. And you shall haue wages for al your souldiours, and if it shall please you to come to the Court, you shall receyue high thanks of the king, and such chere as there can be made you. That is not my desire sayde the Lorde Darcie, for my men shall not say that I brought them out of their Countrie, and nowe to doe my selfe pleasure to leaue them wythout an head, as men of me forsaken: Nay, nay my Lorde, the Banquet is not my desire. So the Lordes parted for that night, and the next day in the morning was sent wages to conduct the armie into England, with diuers giftes geuen to the Lorde Darcie and other Gentlemen.

The same day beyng the. xiij. day of June and Friday, an Englishman desyred of a mayde that had bene at the bakers to buy bread for her maisters store, and not to sell, to haue a loke for his money, she aunswered that she had none to sell, he sayde he would haue one, and followed her: And when shee perceaued that, she cryed, a force, a force. The townes men of Kales Males sodaynely rang their common Bell, and all the towne went to harnesse, and the few English men that were on land went to their Bowes. The Spanyardes cast dartes and sore anoyed the Englishmen, and they lykewise hurt and slue diuers Spanyardes. Then the Captaines of Englande for their part, and the Lords of the counsayle for their part tooke such payne that the fray was ceassed, and but one Englishe man slayne, and of the Spanyards diuers slayne. Then all the Englishe men were commaunded to go on boord of their shippes. The Lordes of Spaine came to the Lorde Darcie, saying: Sir we pray you sithe you knowe the kings pleasure, that you with all your people will go with your shippes away, for we perceaue you owe vs some displeasure. Then he boldly aunswered saying, that he would al the world knew, that he was as liable to conduct his men homeward, as he was to bring them out of their Countrie, without the king of Arragons wages (sauyng his honor) and as for the fray, it was against his will, and without his knowledge: And so that nyght hee and all his men went aboorde their Shippes.

An euill fray begon vpon a lyghte occasion.

When this iourney was come to this point, Henry Guylfoord, Weston Browne, and William Sydney Esquires, yong and lustie Gentlemen, desired lycence to see the Court of Spaine, which was to them graunted: And then they departed from Kales and came to the Court of the king of Arragon, where they were highly enterteyned, and he dubbed Henry Guylford and Weston Browne knights, and gaue to Syr Henry Guylford a Canton of Granado, and to Syr Weston Browne an Egle of Sicill on a chiefe to the augmentation of their armes. William Sydney so excused himselfe that he was not made knight. And when they had soiourned there a whyle, they toke their leaue of the king and Queene and so returned through Fraunce into into England, where they demeaned themselues so, that they had the kings fauour, notwithstanding it was thought to the contrarie. In this meane tyme the Lord Darcie the.xviij. day of June sayled toward England and arryued at Plymmoth, and came to the king at Windsore in the Month of August, and thus ended this voyage.

Margaret Duches of Sauoy.

During the time that the lord Darcy was in Spaine, the Lady Margaret Duches of Sauoy ye daughter to Maximilian the Emperor and gouernour of the countries of Flaunders, Brabant, Holland, and Seland, ye other the lowe Countries apperteyning to Charles the yong Prince of Castell, then beyng of tender age sent in the ende of May to the king of England, to haue. xv. hundred Archers to ayde her against the Duke of Guelders, which sore troubled the Countries afore sayde. The king tenderly regardyng the request of so noble a Lady, and also for that there was then a communication of mariage to be had betwene the yong prince Charles and the Ladie Marie his sister, most gently graunted her request, and appointed Syr Edward Poynynges knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of his house, a valyant Capitayne and a noble warryour to be Lieutenaunt and conductor of the sayde. xv. hundred Archers, which beyng accompanied with the Lord Clynton his sonne in lawe, Syr Mathewe Browne, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Wetherill and Sherley Esquires, and dyuers talle Gentlemen and yomen, well knowen and tryed to the sayde number of. xv. hundred, tooke their shipping at Sandwiche the. xviij. day of July, and landed at Armew the. xix. day, not without some trouble by reason of a storme. And being landed he sent Lancaster an Herault to aduertise the Lady of their arryuall, which forthwith sent to them Lorde Bresly knight of the Toyson (the which is commonly called the golden fleece) and dyuers other to welcome them, and so conducted them to Barowe, where the Lord of the towne made them great cheere. And the same day at after noone came the Ladie Margaret to Barowe, where the Capitayne with all his vnder Capitaynes receaued her at the gate, whome shee welcommed most hartily, and so shee did all the Souldiours which stood along ranged in the strete. And the next day folowyng shee saw all the companie shoote: And the same night the Capitayne and other tooke his leaue of her and departed to Rollynda'e, and on Thursday beyng the last day of July he came to Buldike, and that day the Ladie Margaret came thether. And the next day the whole armie of Almaynes, Flemings and other apperteyning to the sayde Ladie, met with the Englishemen without Buldike, where they set forth in order, the Lady Margaret beyng present, who there tooke her leaue of all the Capitaynes and went to Buldike, whom Sir Edward Poynyngs conducted to the gate, and then returned to the armie.

Sir Edward Poynynges knight sent with a power to ayde the Duches of Sauoy.

The armie to the number of ten thousand of the Ladies part, and. xv. hundreth Englishe men passed through Brabant, and came the tenth day of August next folowyng before a little Castell standyng on the higher syde of the ryuer of Mase, called Brimuoyst, stronglye Bulwarked, in the which were an hundred men belongyng to the Bastard of Gelders, with a Capitaine called Langhessell van Gelder, which robbed and spoyled al the partes of Brabant. They within shot fiercely at the armie as it passed by, but dyd them little hurt. The same night Thomas Heart chiefe Gonner of the Englishe liche part, made his approche with his ordinaunce, and in the morning beat downe as much as might be beaten downe for the Bulwarkes, and the next day beyng the.xj.day of August, the Castell was assaulted valiauntly and taken by force, and the Capitaine and.lxxx.and odde men were slaine, and.xix. taken, of the which a.xj. were hanged. John Morton Captaine of an hundred English men, and one Guyot an Esquier of Burgoyn, crying Burgoyn, Saint George, there was one Englisheman slaine and no more. The.xij. day of August, the army ferryed ouer the ryuer of Mase into the land of Gelders, and there soiourned at a little Church that night, and the next day they came to a towne called Eske, belongyng to the Bastard of Gelders, where all the people were fled, and there was vndermyned and cast downe a little Castell standyng vpon the sayde riuer newly builded. The xx. day of August they brent the towne of Eske, and all the Countrie rounde about it, and came at the last to a towne called Strawly, a strong towne & double ditched and walled, and within it three hundred. lx. good men of warre beside the Inhabitauntes, which at the first commyng shot Gonnes fiercely, and hurt many, and there they planted their siege.

Sir Edward Poynyngs which euer was in the forwarde with hys archers, caused Fagottes to be made, and Trenches to be digged, and his men were so diligent, that his Trenche in the Morning approched so nighe the towne gate, that they within were halfe dismayed, and desired to speake with the Lordes, and so they did, and the.xxiij.day of August were sixe men sent out of the towne to treate, and sixe Hostages delyuered for them, and then it was agreed that all men of warre shoulde depart the Towne with a whyte sticke in their handes, and to forfeyte all other thinges: And all the Towne dwellers to be prisoners at the will of the Prince of Castell. The next day after that the men of warre were departed, earely in the Morning Sir John Digby knight, and John Morton Esquier toke possession of the towne with two hundreth Englishemen. And at after noone, the Admirall of Flaunders, Sir Edward Poynynges, and the Lorde Discilstaine chiefe Capitaynes of the Armie, with all other noble men with Trompets, and their Heraultes in their Cotes of armes before them, as Arthoys, Lancaster, and Ostriche, entered the towne, and in the towne Hall tooke the othe of the Inhabitauntes, and that night returned againe to the armie.

The.xxvj.day of the sayd Moneth, Sir John Digby, and John Morton came out of the towne with all their Englishemen, and for them entered a Capitaine called Yonker Otes, with two hundreth and fifte Almaynes to kepe there a garrison, the which day the armie went before Uenlowe, and they sent Arthoys with a Trompet to summon the towne: But they would not heere them speake, but shot Gonnes at them. The.xxviij. day the armye remoued vnto the Northside of Uenlowe, and part went ouer the water, and made Trenches to the water. The Capitaine of the Englishe men made Trenches euen to the towne diche, and the Artillary bet downe the Towres of the walles. The siege thus continuyng not without dayly skirmishes.xxix. dayes, Sir Edward Poynynges, and Sir John Digby dined one day with Mounsire de Romy, and all other Englishe Capitaynes and petie Capitaynes dyned with an Almaine called Clene Anderlyne, except sir Mathew Browne, and John Fogge which kept the fielde, & Richard Wethyll which kept the Trenche, and was ſore beſet. And in the dinner tyme they of the Towne iſſued out vpon the Engliſh men, and hurt and toke one Sheldwiche of Cauntorbury priſoner, and one Miles: But the Engliſh men ſlue and hurt many of them, and compelled them to returne by force of arrowes, and ſo they reculed with one priſoner. For Miles which was led betweene two of the Gelders, perceiuyng reſcue commyng, after as he came to an hill, thruſt the two Gelders downe the hill before him, and ſo ranne backe to his companie, which the two Gelders that led him perceiuyng, came to Sheldwiche and ſlue him. After long ſiege layde to this towne, and no good done, for the towne was ſo great that they had not men enough to compaſſe it, they all agreed to breake vp their ſiege and armie for that yere, and ſo departed. Sir Edward Poynynges went to the Court of Burgoyn, where he was highly enterteyned of the yong Prince, and of the Ladie Margaret his Aunt, and receyued great giftes and thankes for his paynes. And after that Sir Edward Poynynges with all the other Capitaynes of the Engliſhe men had bene highly feaſted, and more prayſed for their valiauntneſſe, than he with all his companie returned into England, and had loſt by warre and ſickneſſe not fully an hundreth perſons.

The returne of Syr Edwarde Poynynges.

In June the king beyng at Leyceſter, tidynges was brought vnto him, that Andrewe Barton a Scottiſhe man and a Pirate of the Sea, ſaiyng that the Scottes had warre with the Portingales, did rob euery nation, and ſo ſtopped the kinges ſtreames, that no Marchaunt almoſt coulde paſſe. The king beyng greatly moued with this craftie Pirate, ſent Sir Edmond Haward Lorde Admirall of Englande, and Lorde Thomas Haward, ſonne and heyre to the Erle of Surrey, in all the haſte to the Sea, which haſtilye made redie two ſhippes, and without any lenger abode tooke the Sea, and by chaunce of weather were ſeuered. The Lorde Hawarde liyng in the Downes, perceyued where Andrew was makyng toward Scotland, and ſo faſt the ſayd Lord chaſed him, that he ouertooke him, and there was a ſore battaile: The Engliſhe men were fierce, and the Scottes defended themſelues manfully, but in the ende the Lorde Haward and his men entered the maine decke, and in concluſion Andrew was taken, beyng ſo ſore wounded that he dyed there, and the remnant of the Scottes were taken, with their Shippe called the Lion.

Andrewes Barton a Scottiſhe pirate taken and ſlayne.

All this while was the Lorde Admyrall in chace of the Barke of Scotlande called Jenny Pirwyn, which was wont to ſayle with the Lion in company, and ſo much did he with other that he layed him aboord and fiercely aſſayled him, and in the end the Lorde Admirall entred the Barke and ſlewe many and tooke all the reſt. Thus were theſe two ſhippes taken and brought to Blackewall the ſecond daye of Auguſt, and all the Scottes were ſent to the Biſhoppes place of Yorke, and there remayned at the kings charge vntill other order was taken for them.

After this the kyng ſent the Biſhop of Wincheſter and certayne of hys Counſaile to the Archbiſhop of Yorkes place where the Scottes were priſoners. And there the Biſhop reherſed to them, where as peace was yet betwene England and Scotland, that they contrarie thervnto as theeues and Pirates had robbed the kinges ſubiectes within his ſtremes: wherfore they had deſerued to dye by the lawe and to be hanged at the lowe water marke.

Then

Then sayde the Scottes we knowlege our offence and aske mercy and not the lawe: Then sayd a Priest we appeale from the kings iustice to his mercy. Then the Bishop asked him if he were auctholised by them to say so: and they cried all yea, yea: Then sayd he you shall find the kings mercie aboue his iustice. For where ye were dead by the lawe, yet by his mercye he will reuiue you: Wherefore ye shall departe out of this realme within .xx. dayes, vpon paine of death if ye be found here after .xx. dayes, and praie for the kyng, and so they passed into their countrye.

The king of Scottes hearing of the death of Androwe Barton and taking of his two ships was wonderfull wroth, and sent letters vnto the kyng, requiring restitucion according to the league & amitie. The kyng wrote with brotherlye salutation to the king of Scottes, for the robberies and euill doings of Androw Barton and that it became not one Prince to laye a breache of a league to another prince in doing iustice vpon a Pirate and a theefe: and that all the other Scottes had deserued to die by iustice if he had not extended his mercy: and with this aunswere the Scottish Herault departed home.

During this season there began great warre betwene Pope July and the frenche king Lewys the twelfe. The occasion began by one John Bentiuoyle a great Lord of Italy, which kept the Citie of Bolonia le grace from the Pope which by the ayde of the French kyng gate the sayd Citie from the aforenamed John Bentiuoyl. But afterward because the sayd Pope Julye tooke peace with the Venecians, the French king turned from the Pope and made warre on him on the behalfe of John Bentiuoile, and tooke from him againe the sayd Citie of Bolonia.

The kyng of England wrote often to king Lewys of Fraunce to desist from the persecuting of the Pope which was his friend and confederate. To the which writing the French king gaue litle eare: wherfore the king sent him word to deliuer his lawful inheritaunce, both of the Duchy of Normandie and Guyan and the Countries of Anieow and Mayne, and also of his Crowne of Fraunce, else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose. For all these writinges the French king made warres still in Italie, and the king could haue of him no certaine aunswere. Wherefore after great deliberation had, he by the aduice of his counsaile determined to make warre on the French king and his Countries, and calling to him Maximilian the Emperour and Fardinando king of Arragon and diuers other Princes, he made great preparation both by Sea and land, and fortefied his Frontiers against Fraunce, and set forth shippes to the Sea for defence of his Marchaunts, which were dayly in ieoperdy vnder a pretensed peace of the French king Lewys the twelfe.

King Henry the eight taketh the Popes part.

The fiftenth daye of Januarie nert following the king held his high Court of Parliament at Westminster and there was graunted vnto him toward the maintenance of his warres with Fraunce two fiftenes of the temporaltie and two Disimes of the Clergye. And during the time of this parliament one Newbolt yoman of the kinges gard whome the king highly fauoured, slew wilfully a seruaunt of the Lorde Willoughbyes in the Pallace of Westminster, where he honge two daies in example of other.

rupt, and had bene conueied out of the realme for debt, was now in such fauor with Pope July, that he made him his Collector and Procter in England, & so he kept a great porte and oftentymes resorted to the kyng and his counsaile for the Popes affayres which then was sore troubled by the French king, so that he knew both the Popes councell and the kinges, and falsly and vntruelye resorted in the night vnto the French Ambassadors lying in London, and to them discouered what the king and Pope intended, which was not so closely done but the king knew it: and so he was layd for, and was taken commoning with one of the sayd Ambassadors late in the night, and was brought to the Tower of London, where he remained vntill by the sute of his friends he was deliuered, and shortely for shame he voyded the realme.

The king of Arragon, which also had warre with the French king, and heering that his sonne, the kyng of England would make warre in Fraunce, did write to hym that the Duchy of Guyan was his true inheritaunce, which adioyned to his country of Biskey: wherfore if the king of England would entend to recouer his Duchy first, and send an armie of men to Biskeye, and so to begin at Bayon, which is the kaye of Guyan, he woulde ayde them with ordinaunce, horsemen, and beastes for cartage, with other necessaries appertaining to the same. The king and his counsayle putting their affiaunce in the promise of the king of Arragon prepared a noble army al of footemen & small ordinaunce trusting to the king of Arragon for the ayde of horsmen and great ordinaunce, and of the same made Capitaine the noble Lord Thomas Graye Marques Dorset to whome he assigned manye other Gentlemen as after shall apere.

The kyng nowe greatlye studying to furnishe his warre which he had begon against the frenche king, caused Sir Edwarde Hayward his Admyrall, with all dilligence to take the Sea, which with all spede possible, made readie diuerse goodly and talle shippes, as the Souereigne and other to the number of .xviij. beside litle shippes: and in his companye were Capitaynes, Sir Weston Browne, Griffith Donne, Edward Cobham, Thomas Wyndam, Thomas Lucye, William Pirton, Henrie Sherborne, Stephin Bull, George Witwange, John Hopton, William Grimstone, Thomas Draper, Edmond Cooke, John Bordet, with diuers other. When all these were shipped, they sayled to Douer, and skowred the seas, and so came before Portesmouth about the middest of Maye.

Guyot of Guy an Almayne.

The thirde daye of Maye a Gentillman of Flaunders called Guyot of Guye came to the king with fiue hundred Almaines all in white, which was cut so small that it could scarse hold together. After they had mustered at the Blackheath, the king made him knight, and gaue him a great chayne and a yerely pencion, and sent hym with his band to Southampton, there to tary the comming of the Marques Dorcet.

The Marques Dorset sayleth with an army into Biskey.

About myd Maye the Lorde Marques Dorset and other noble men appoynted by the king for the iourney of Biskey as the Lord Hayward sonne and heire to the Erle of Surrey the Lorde Brooke, the Lorde Willoughbie, the Lord Ferrers, the Lorde John, the Lorde Anthony, and the Lorde Leonard Greye, all three brethren to the Marques, Sir Griffith Apryce, Sir Maurice Barkeley, Sir William Sandes, The Baron of Burforde, Sir Richard Cornewale, his brother William Husey, John Pelton, William Kingston kingston Esquires, Sir Henr Willoughby and diuers other with Souldiours to the number of ten thousand men, came to Southampton and there mustered, and hauing a freshe winde they were all shipped and passed to the Sea the .xvj. daye of May, and he with all his Naule arriued in Biskey at a Port called Pallagh, Southwest of Fountrabye: And the thirde daye of June the Lorde Marques and all his whole company landed and tooke the fielde, & him wisely embatteled for his safegarde. The Biskeyns that brought victuall to the armie, sayde to the Souldiers, Sirs you are arriued here in trust that the king of Arragon will helpe you with ordinaunce and cariages, we here of no preparatiō that he maketh, nor neuer sent vs worde to prepare for your comming, of the which we marueil much. These wordes ranne daily through the Hoste, which made many men sad and to muse, and the Biskeyns sore feared least the Englishmen would destroy their Countrie, because their king kept not promise with them. But the Marques made such streight proclamacion, that no souldier durst do any iniury vnto them. Within thre daies after the armye had lyen in the fielde, there came to him an Erle and an other Noble man to welcome him and his companie. Then the Lorde Capitayne remoued his fielde, and tooke another place nerer Fountraby, more plenteous of Water and Wood, and there pitched his fielde, euerie daye lookyng for ayde of the king of Arragon, but he heard of none. Then he called a counsaile and deuised how they might haue Beastes to drawe ordinaunce and cariages. Then one Sir John Stile an Englishman caused to be bought two hundred Muletes and Alles of such price as the Spanyards gained greatlie: but when they were put to carye, they woulde neyther beare nor drawe, for they were Beastes which were not exercised before. Then the Lorde Marques much lamented the chaunce: for if he had had ready two hundred drawing Beastes, he myght haue ronne a great waye into Guyan with his power, which then was not fortefied neither of men, of warre, nor munition, nor artillarie.

The Frenchemen of Bayon, hearing of the English mens campe, made a great aserie betwene the ryuer of Saint Maria and Bayon: the English men perceyuing the same, passed the ryuer in good order of battayle, all beyng on foote for lack of the horsemen that the king of Arragon promised, and so with arrowes chased the Frenchmen on horsebacke that they fled, and many horses foundered, and many a man was brosed or they came to Bayon, at the which the Englishe men laughed and lamented. First to see their cowardnesse, second, to remember what they might haue done, if they had had horses meete for their purpose: yet all this notwithstanding, they retired to their Campe in such order, that the Spanyardes wondered much, both at their fierce courage and sober order.

The king of Nauerre hearing of the puyssaunt armie of the Englishmen lyyng in Biskey so neere to his Countrie, was sore troubled, and wondered much what the matter should meane: wherfore, he sent to the Lorde Marques, a Bysshop and dyuers other, to shewe to him and all his counsayle, that if it pleased them, his Countrie should sende them vittayle, and all things necessarie for their money, and to doe any other pleasure that they could doe, which might be to the pleasure of him and all his armie, so that his realme should be sure of any inuasions to be made by his people.

A gentle offer made by the king of Nauerre.

The Marques being Capitaine generall, with the aduiſe of the other Lords and counſayle, much highly thanked the king of Nauerre of his good will, aide, and comfort, which things only they required: and if it pleaſed him that his people will and maye vittaile vs, we ſhall not onely pay them for it, but alſo warrant their paſſing and repaſſing for vs and oures in ſafetie, and that by vs no preiudice ſhall be done to his realme, nor by our conſent. With which aunſwere the king of Nauerre was ioyous, and ſuffered his people to vittayle, and reſort to the hoſte, with all thynges neceſſarie and belongyng to the ſame, in great windes and ſtormes, for that time happened much winde and raine, which ſore encombered the ſouldiours, that lay nightly on the bare ground, for euery man had not a tent or pauilion, wherof ſome were lame, and ſome deaffe, with other diſeaſes.

When the armie had lien there .xxx. dayes, in the ſecond Moneth there came from the king of Arragon, a Byſhop and other nobles of his counſail: but when it was knowne that it was the ſame Byſhop that made the aunſwere to the Lord Darcie at Kales Wales, as you haue heard the laſt yere, then many ſaid, he came for no good but for delayes: but he required the lord Marques to take pacience, for ſhortly ſuch preparation ſhould be made, that he ſhould ſee and prooue, that it ſhould be to the honor of his maiſter, and his great renoume. To whome the Marques aunſwered, that vpon confydence of the king of Arragons promiſe, that they ſhould lacke no beaſtes meete for drawyng, and horſemen, the king of Englande had ſent him and his companions thether, whereof we haue truſted ſithe our firſt hether commyng, which things if we had had, we had done other enterpriſes then we haue done: for now we haue lyen here in Campe, to the great charge of our maiſter the king of Englande, and to no profite, and to our loſſe and great hurt. For at our arryuall the Country of Guyan for the which we came, was vnprouided of men of warre, munitions, and ordinaunce, by reaſon wherof, (if al things had bene accompliſhed of the part of your maiſter as we truſted) we might haue had that which we came for, and if our commiſſion had not bene to folow the king your maiſters will, as to whome we be ſent, I aſſure you we would haue done otherwiſe or this: but now the Frenchmen haue fortefied, vittayled, and manned their townes, and we haue ſpent time and done nothing at all, lyngering for the king your maiſter, to the loſſe of vs and great blemiſhing of our honours.

The Byſhop perceyuing that the Engliſhe Capitaynes were courageous and diſcontent with their ydle abode, flatteringly deſired them to tarie a whyle for the beſt, for a back enemie ſayde he, is to be regarded. Then ſaid the Lorde Marques Capitaine generall, if we knewe the kinges intent, it would ſuffiſe vs. Then ſayde the Byſhop, you ſhall know it ſhortly: and ſo he departed from the armie.

The armie this lyngering, euer deſirous to be at the buſineſſe that they came for, their vittayle was much part Garlike, and the Engliſhe men did eate of the Garlike with all meates, and dranke hote wynes in the hote weather, and did eate all the hote fruites that they could get, which cauſed their bloud ſo to boyle in their bellyes, that there fel ſick three thouſand of the flire, and thereof died. rviij. hundred men.

The Lord Marques and other Capitaynes perceyuing this miſchiefe, ſent ſent to the king of Arragon certaine Lordes of the hoſte to knowe his pleaſure. The which aunſwered them with gentle faſhion, that the counſayle of Englande and hys counſayle, had taken an order in all thyng of late, and howe the Duke Dalua a great Prince of Spaine, ſhoulde ſhortly with an armie royall ioyne with them, and ſo to proceede in their enterpriſe. Wyth which aunſwere and ſmall cheere, the Lordes of Englande departed, and made report to their Capitaine accordyng, which thought it verie ſleight, but euer hee regarded his Mayſters commaundement, and counſayled all the Lordes to be content with the ſame.

The Lorde Marques ſendeth to the king of Arragon for performance of his promiſe.

The armie lyng thus, ſtill, and the ſickneſſe not ſlaked, the people beyng ydle, ſome euill diſpoſed perſons ſayd, that euery Capitain was alowed viij.pence for euery common Souldiour, which was vntrue, for they had alowed onely ſixe pence, and ſo began to gather companies. The Lordes perceyuyng this, tooke with them their truſtie ſeruauntes, and toke the begynners of the miſchiefe, which were of the retinue of the Lorde Willoughby, and put them in warde. When they were arreſted, other of like euill diſpoſition began to crake and face: which thing beyng perceyued, the Lord Marques by the aduiſe of other Capitaynes cauſed ſerch to be made, and ſo found out the beginner of the miſchiefe, which was deliuered to William Kingſton Eſquier, then Prouoſt Marſhall, and ſo was put to death to the terror of all other.

The Engliſh men thus lyng ydlely abyding the ayde of the king of Arragon, tidynges came dayly into the hoſte, howe the Duke Dalua was commyng with a great puyſſaunce to ioyne with the Engliſhe armie, and ſo to inuade Guian: the Engliſhe Capitaines were ioyfull of theſe tidinges, not ſo much for the ayde of the Spaniardes, which they little regarded, but for the beaſtes for Cariage of great Artillarie.

Howe they thus lookyng for the Duke Dalua, heard euery day howe he marched towarde them, and was within a dayes iourney or little more of them, of the which the Engliſh men were marueylous ioyfull, but the Duke which pretended another thing, ſodainly remoued his armie in a night with ſuch diligence that he entered the realme of Nauerre, and was before the Citie of Pampilona the chiefe Citie of Nauerre, before the king wiſt of it, which nothing ſuſpected of that pollicie.

A ſleight and deceyt vſed by the king of Arragon.

Thus the king was ſodainly trapped, ſuppoſing the armie of Spaine to haue bene raiſed to inuade Guyan, and hauing nothing defenſable for the war, in ỹ night fled out at a poſterne into Fraunce, where he after died. The Citie of Pampilona and all the Countrie of Nauar, beyng vnprouided of artilarie and other defences, yeelded themſelues to the Spanyardes, and thus was the realme of Nauerre wonne, which thing made the Lord Marques and his companie not a little to maruayle. So ſhortly after came to the Lorde Capitayne of the Engliſhe men, diuers Lordes ſent from the king of Arragon, which ſayde: The king our ſoueraigne Lorde ſendeth to you great gramercie, and highly thanketh you for your paine, and ſo it is, that by Gods grace and your good abode, he with his power hath taken and conquered the realme of Nauerre, and if that countrie had not bene taken, they might haue intercepted all ſuch ordinaunce and victayle, as the king of Arragon our maiſter might haue ſent to you, but nowe you be in ſuch a ſuretie and his puyſſaunce with you, and yours with his, that ye maye ſafely ioyne, which you ſhall ſee ſhortly, yea, & he himſelfe in proper perſon to ioyne with you. Well ſayde the Lorde Marques Capitaine generall, we haue ſoiourned long here abidyng his comming, and if the commiſſion and expreſſe commaundement of the king my ſouereigne Lorde were not, that I ſhould doe nothing without the aſſent of the king your maiſter, I aſſure you that the French men ſhould haue knowne that Engliſhe men had beene here, and not to haue lyen ſo long in ydleneſſe as we haue done: but if the king your maiſter do as you report, it ſhall be much to his honor and to our great comfort, and ſo the Lordes of Spaine departed.

Thus the armie lay till the Moneth of October, and Winter began ſore to encreaſe, and the Lorde Marques Capitayne generall fell ſore ſicke, and then the Lorde Haward had vnder him the whole gouernaunce of the army, to whome were ſent diuers Lordes of the priuie Counſail of Spaine, ſaiyng: the king our Maiſter ſendeth you worde, that he would gladly come to you, but the ſeaſon is ſpent, the grounde is ſo moyſt that cariage can not be conueied, the fieldes ſo barren that beaſtes can not feede, and the weather ſo troublous that people can not well lye abrode in campe: therefore he would deſire you all theſe thinges conſidered, to breake vp your field, and ſeuer your ſelfe to the townes and villages of his Country, till the ſpring of the yere, at which tyme there ſhall reſort to you, freſhe ſuccors out of Englande, and he himſelfe will be with you with all ordinaunce neceſſary, as becõmeth to ſuch an armie, and then ſhall procede the firſt pretenſed enterpriſe, to the honor of the king your maiſter and ours, and not to your ſmall fame and renowme. When this meſſage was heard by the whole Counſaile, no man was contented, but the Lorde Hawarde which had the whole gouernaunce vnder the Marques ſayd: What report of honor can we make of the king of Arragon your maiſter, for at his deſyre we be come hether, & here haue lyen in campe a long ſpace, euer tariyng for performaunce of his promiſe, and yet nothing hath he performed, our people be dead of the flixe in great number: we gentlemen eche one doth much lament this long ydleneſſe, by reaſon wherof many a tall man hauyng nothing to doe, but abidyng your Maiſters pleaſure, hath fallẽ into ſome miſchiefe, or by ſickneſſe, or elſe for miſdoing executed by iuſtice. What ſhall the king our maiſter report of our ſlouthfulneſſe, which hath ſpent him innumerable treaſure and nothing gayned? And yet we would make Winter warre, and the king of Arragon your maiſter vs denieth of ſuch thinges as he promiſed, and willeth vs like Cowardes to our diſhonour to rayſe our campe without any notable act done on the Frenchmen, for which cauſe we came.

The Spanyardes perceiuing the grudge of the Engliſhe men, ſayd that time paſſed could not be reuoked, and that they had not lyen ydely, for the frontiers of Guyan had ſuſteyned ſuche damage, as in many yeres they ſhall not recouer againe, and all this while the frenchmen durſt not meddle with you, ſo that you haue loſt no honor, and if you tary here this Winter by your daylie ſkirmiſhing, they ſhall receyue great damage: during which time, the king our maiſter hath commaunded, that things meete and neceſſary for you ſhall be at your commaundement, and in the ſpring of the yere, he ſhall ioyne with you, ſo that your enemies & his ſhall well know your puyſſaunce, for he taketh all enemies to you, to be his, so with fayre wordes the counsaile of Spaine departed.

Then the Lorde Haward beyng chiefe, because the Marques was sick, counsayled with all the other Lordes and Capitaines, and so in the ende of October they agreed to breake vp their Campe, and so they did, and the Lorde Marques and his people went to Saint Sebastian, the Lorde Haward and his retinew to Rendre, and the Lorde Willoughby to Garschang, Sir Wylliam Sandes and manye other Capitaines to Fountrable, and so euery Capitayne with his retinew were seuered in diuers Villages.

The Englishe souldiours, what for sickneſſe, and what for miſerie of the Countrie, euer desired to returne into England. The king of Englande aduertised by the king of Arragon of his intent, and how he would set forward the first spring, sent Wynsore his Herauld of armes to his armie wylling them there to tarie, and that he would send them newe ayde, vnder the conduite of the Lord Harbert, his Chamberlaine: which letter when it was red, the Souldiours began to murmure and grudge after suche a sort, saiyng: that they would not abide and die of the flixe in such a wretched Countrie, to be defrauded and mocked of the king of Arragon the next yere, as they were this yere, and spake such outrageous wordes, that the Capitaine could not stay them, insomuch that they in a furie had slayne the Lorde Haward and dyuers other, if they had not folowed their mindes, and so they hired shippes and put the Lorde Marques in one, which was so weake that he asked where he was: and then euery man shipped, which was in November, and in the beginning of December they landed in Englande. The king of Arragon was sore discontent with their departing, for they spent much money and substaunce in his Countrie, and sayde openly, that if they had taried, he would haue inuaded Guyan, and the Englishe men were glad that they were departed out of such a Countrie, where they had little helth, lesse pleasure, and much losse of time: but by their lyng there, the king of Arragon stale the realme of Nauerre, and the Englishe men left as much money there, as he sent into England with his daughter.

When the Marques sayled into Spaine in the Moneth of Maye, the same time Sir Edward Hawarde Lorde Admirall of Englande, as you haue heard before, sayled toward Britaine, and on Trinitie Sunday arriued at Bertram Bay in Britaine, with twentie great shippes, and sodainely set his men on lande: then the Britaynes made an aserie, and set their Beacons on fyre, and shot out of a Bulwarke that they had fortefied at the poynt of the Bay: but the Englishe men which were in the ship of Wylliam Gonstone Grocer of London, tooke first lande maugre them all, and all other after, and so manfully they set on the Bulwarke that they wanne it, and the Britons fled and many slayne. Then the Admyrall set hys men in an order, and passed in the Countrie seuen Myles, burning and wasting townes and Vyllages: and in hys returne he skirmished with diuers men of armes and slue dyuers of them, and notwithstanding the Britons fought valyauntly for defence of their Countrie, yet they lost and nothing wanne: and so the Lorde Admirall returned to his ship.

Upon Monday the .xriij. daye of May he landed in the morning, and commaunded to burne the Lorde Piers Meguns place, and the towne of Conket and dyuers other places, and chaſed the Bꝛytones to the Caſtell of Bꝛeſt, and foꝛ all aſſembles and ſhowes that the Bꝛitones made, yet they ſuffered the Engliſhe men peaceably to returne with their pꝛayes & gaines. The Bꝛitons ſeyng the hurt that the naule of England did to them, ſayde: alas the King of England hath euer befoꝛe this time ſuccoured vs, and now he intendeth to deſtroy vs, ſhame come to him that is the cauſe thereof.

Conket

The firſt day of Jume the Engliſhe men toke lande in Croyton Bay: then the Loꝛdes of Bꝛitain ſent woꝛd to the Loꝛd Admirall, that if he would abyde, they would fight with him in playne fielde. The Admirall rewarded the meſſenger, and ſayde, go ſay to them that ſent thee, that all this day they ſhall finde me here tarꝛyng their comming. Then he to encourage dyuers Gentlemen dubbed them knightes, as Syꝛ Edward Bꝛooke, bꝛother to the Loꝛd Cobham, Syꝛ Gꝛiffithe Doume, Syꝛ Thomas Wyndam, Syꝛ Thomas Lucie, Sir Willyam Pirton, Sir Henry Shirboꝛne, Sir Stephen Bull, Sir John Burdett: Then the Loꝛde Admirall highly encouraged his men when he ſawe the Bꝛitons come, which were ten thouſande at the leaſt, the Engliſhe men but onely. xxv.C. oꝛ fewe aboue, bydding them remember the honoꝛ and renowne that ſhould come to them, if they gayned the ioꝛney, and yet if they were ſlayne, their valyauntneſſe was to be pꝛayſed, and their true diligence to doe their mayſter ſeruice much to be alowed.

When the Bꝛitons ſawe the oꝛder of the Engliſhe men, and their Banners diſplayed, they were ſodeynly aſtonied: then a Gentleman of Bꝛiteyn of much experience, aduiſed the other Capitaines not to fight, but to returne a little and to take a ſtrong ground, and to watch the Engliſhmen, when they returned to their ſhippes, and then to take the aduantage. And ſo the Capitaynes began to returne: and when the Commons ſawe them returne, all they ranne away as faſt as they might, ſuppoſyng that their Capitaynes had ſeene oꝛ knowen ſome great perill towarde them, becauſe they were not pꝛiuie of their Capitaines Counſail. And when they came home to their houſes, ſome ſayd the battaile was great, and ſome ſayde that the Engliſhmen were xl. thouſand. The Loꝛd Admirall ſeeyng this chaunce, when night came departed to his ſhippes: but yet they knew not why they fled, till after he heard the truth. The Gentlemen of Bꝛiteyn called a great counſaile, ſaiyng: that the Engliſhemen dayly waſted the Countrie on the Sea coſte, and that there was no truſt in the Commonaltie, and that the Gentlemen alone coulde not defende the Countrie: wheꝛefoꝛe, they concluded to ſende a Meſſenger to the Loꝛd Admirall, deſiryng him of a ſafeconduite foꝛ diuers perſonnes to ſpeake with him, the which he gently graunted. Then certaine Loꝛdes of Bꝛiteyn toke a Boate, and came to the ſhip of the Loꝛde Admirall, where he was ſet with all the Counſaile of the Capitaynes about him. Then they deſired him humbly to ſurceſſe off his rigoꝛous and cruell warre, and eſpecially of burning of townes which to you is no pꝛofite, and if you will haue the Caſtell of Bꝛeſt, it ſhall be at your commaundement, ſo that you be able to defende it, and we deſyre nothing ſo much as peace. Nay ſayde the Loꝛde Admirall, we are ſent hether to make warre and not peace. Then they humbly required him foꝛ Goddes ſake to graunt them peace foꝛ fiue dayes, ſo that they might ſend to the king their Loꝛde, to aduertiſe him of their trouble and calamitie. Then the Loꝛd Admirall aunſwered, that Gentlemen ought to defende their Countrie by force, rather then to sue for peace: with the which saiyng the Britons were ashamed: yet they hartily thanked him, and so he made them a banket, and they departed: and they sent a land for fresh water and other freshe vitayles, and then heeryng that there were men of warre vpon the sea, he coasted from them alongst all the coastes of Normandie, still scouryng the Seas, so that no enemie appered: & at the last came and lay by the Isle of Wight, to see if any enemies would appere on the Englishe coast: duryng which tyme diuers shippes kept the North seas, vnder the conduite of Sir Edward Ichyngham, John Lewys, and John Loueday, which diligently scoured the seas.

The king euer remembring his warres, caused all his Shippes and Galies to be rigged and prepared, with al maner of ordinaunce and artillary, meete for shippes of warre. And amongest all other, he decked the Regent a ship royall, as chiefe ship of that nauie, and then caused Souldiours mete for the same shippes to muster on Blacke heath, and he appoynted Capitaynes for that tyme, Sir Anthony Oughtred, Sir Edward Ichingham, William Sidney, and dyuers other Gentlemen, which shortly shipped and came before the Isle of Wight, but in their passage a Galley was lost by negligence of the Mayster.

The king desiryng to see his nauie together, rode to Portesmouth, and there he appoynted Capitaynes for the Regent, Sir Thomas Kniuet, Mayster of his horse, and Sir John Carew of Deuonshire. And to another ship royall called the Souereigne, he appoynted sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford, and with them in the Souereigne were put. lx. of the tallest yomen of the kinges Garde, and manye other Gentlemen were made Capitaynes. The king made a great banquet to all the Capitaynes, & euery one sware to another euer to defende, ayde, and comfort one another, without failyng, and this they promised before the king, which committed them to God, and so with great noyse of Winstrelsie they tooke their shippes, which were. xxb. in number of great burden, and well furnished of all thinges.

The French king heeryng what dammage the Englishe men had done in Briteyn, strongly furnished his Nauie in the Hauen of Brest, to the number of. xxxix. sayle, and for chiefe ordeyned a Caricke of Brest, apperteinyng to the Queene his wife, which was Duchesse and heyre of Briteyne called Cordelier, which was a strong ship furnished in all poyntes, and so they set forward out of Brest, the tenth day of August, and came to Briteyne Bay, in which place the selfe same day, the Englishe nauy was arryued.

When the Englishe men perceyued the French nauie to be out of Brest Hauen, then the Lorde Admirall was very ioyous, then euery man prepared accordyng to his duetie, the Archers to shoote, the Gonners to lose, the men of armes to fight, the Pages went to the top Castell with Dartes: thus all thinges beyng prouided and set in order, the Englishemen approched toward the Frenchemen, which came fiercely forward, some leauyng his Ancre, some with his foresayle onely to take the most aduauntage: and when they were in sight, they shot ordinaunce so terribly together, that all the Sea coast sounded of it. The Lorde Admirall made with the great Shippe of Depe, and chased her still: Sir Henry Guylford and sir Charles Brandon, beyng in the Souereigne, made with the great Caricke of Brest, and layde ſtemme to ſtemme to the Caricke, but by negligence of the Maiſter, or elſe by ſmoke of the ordinaunce, or otherwiſe, the Souereigne was caſt at the ſterne of the Caricke, with which aduauntage the Frenche men chowted for ioy: but when Sir Thomas Knuet which was readie to haue borded the great ſhip of Depe, ſaw that the Souereigne had miſſed the Caricke, which ſir Anthony Oughtred chaſed hard at the ſterne, and bowged her in diuers places, and ſet a fire her powder as ſome ſay, but ſodeinly the Regent grappeled with her a long boorde, and when they of the Caricke perceyued that they could not depart, they let ſlip an Ancre, and ſo with the ſtreme the ſhips turned, and the Caricke was on the weatherſide, and the Regent on the lye ſyde, the fight was very cruell, for the Archers of the Engliſhe part, and the Croſſbowes of the French part did their vttermoſt: but for all that the Engliſhe men entered the Caricke, which ſeeyng a Uerlet Gonner beyng deſperate, put fire in the Gonpowder, as other ſay, and ſet the whole ſhip of fyre, the flame whereof, ſet fire in the Regent, and ſo theſe two noble ſhips which were ſo grappeled together that they could not part, were conſumed by fyre. The French naule perceiuyng this fled in all haſt, ſome to Breſt, and ſome to the Iſles adioinyng. The Engliſh men in maner diſmayed, ſent out Boates to helpe them in the Regent, but the fyre was ſo great that no man durſt approch, ſauyng that by the Iames of Hull were certaine Frenchemen that could ſwim ſaued. This burnyng of the Caricke was happie for the French naule, or elſe they had bene better aſſayled of the Engliſhemen, which were ſo amaſed with this chaunce, that they folowed them not. The Capitaine of this Caricke was ſir Piers Morgan, and with him .ix. hundred men ſlaine and dead: And with ſir Thomas Knyuet, and ſir Iohn Carow, were ſeuen hundred men drowned and brent, and that night all the Engliſhe men lay in Bartram Bay, for the French fleete was ſparkeled as you haue heard.

The Caricke and the Regent burned.

The Lord Admyrall called all the Capitaines together, deſiring them not to be aſhamed with this chaunce of warre, for he thought nowe that this was the worſt fortune that coulde happen to them, therefore to ſtudie how to be reuenged, and ſo they concluded all to goe to the Sea, which they did, and on the coaſt of Britaine tooke many ſhippes, and ſuch as they coulde not carie awaye they ſet on fire, ſmall and great to a great number on all the coaſt of Britaine, Normandy and Picardy, and thus they kept the Sea. The king of England hearing of the loſſe of the Regent, cauſed a great ſhip to be made ſuche another as was neuer ſeene before in Englande, and called it Henry grace de dieu.

Henry grace de dieu.

The French kyng heering that his fleete was thus deuided, and of the loſſe of his great Caricke, he ſent to a knight of the Rhodes called Prior Iohn, which had three Galies of force, wyth diuers Foyſtes and Rowgalies ſo well ordinaunced and wyth ſuch peces as was not ſene in ſhippes before his comming: for he laye one the coaſt of Barberye, to defend certaine of the religion of the Rhodes comming to Tripoly, and at the French kinges requeſt came into Britaine and there taried.

A parliamẽt whereon it was agreed that the king himſelfe ſhould enter Fraũce with an armie royall.

In Nouember the king called his high court of Parliament, and there was concluded that the king himſelfe in perſon, wyth an armie royall would inuade his realme of Fraunce, with Fyre and Sworde, which thing being knowne to his Subiectes, and eſpecially to ſuch as ſhoulde go with him, no man man can doubt, but that preparation was made of harneſſe, weapon, artillery, banners, and all other thinges neceſſarie for ſuch an enterprice.

And after the Purification of our Ladie, the king created Sir Charles Brandon Viſcount Liſle. In Marche following, the kinges Naue of ſhippes royall, and other mete for the warre ſet forth to the number of .xvij. beſide other Balangers: the Lorde Admirall was chiefe, and with him Sir Water Deuereux Lorde Ferrers, Syr Weſton Browne, Sir Edwarde Ichyngham, ſir Antony Poyntz, ſir John Wallop, ſyr Thomas Windam, ſir Stephen Bull, William Fitz Willyam, Arthur Plantaginet, William Sidney Eſquires, and diuers other noble and valiant Capitaines: they ſayled to Portesmouthe, and there laye abiding winde: during which time the kyng ſent into Flaunders for ſuche thinges as he needed, and cauſed them to be brought to Calice againſt his comming.

When the winde ſerued, the Naue royall of Englande wayed anker and made ſaile into Britaine, and came into Bertram Bay, and there laye at Anker in the ſight of the French Naue. Now you muſt vnderſtande, that all the great Naue which the French kyng had prepared, laie in the hauen of Breſt, ſo well furniſhed in all thinges, that no doubt it was a wonder to ſee: but when they were readie to ſet forth, and ſaw the Engliſh fleete on the coaſt, they determined to ſaue themſelues in Breſt hauen. Then the Engliſhmen determined clerely to ſet on them in the hauen, and ſo in good order of battaile ſayled forwarde, but at the firſt entrie one ſhippe, whereof Arthur Plantagenet was Capitaine, fell on a blinde Rocke and braſt a ſunder, by reaſon whereof, all the other ſtayed to the great diſpleaſure of all the remnaunt, and not to the litle ioye of the French men which ſhot at them without doyng anye harme. So the Engliſhe Capitaines perceyuing that the Hauen was daungerous to enter without an expert Lodeſman caſt about and returned to their harborough at Bertram Bay againe.

The French men perceyuing that the Engliſh men entended to aſſayle them, moored their ſhippes as nigh to the Caſtell of Breſt as they could, and ſet Bulwarkes on the lande on euerie ſide to ſhoote at the Engliſhmen. Alſo they frapped together .xviij. great Hulckes, that came to the Baye for ſalte, and ſet them on a rowe, to the entent that if the Engliſhmen would haue aſſaulted them, they would haue ſet them on a fier, and let them driue with the ſtreme amongſt the Engliſh Nauy. Prior John alſo laye ſtill in Blacke Sable or Whiteſande Baye, and plucked his Galies to the ſhore, and ſet his Baſiliſkes and other ordinaunce in the mouth of the Baye, which Baye was bulwarked on euery ſide, that by water it was not poſſible to be wonne.

The Lord Admirall perceyuing the Nauy of Fraunce to lye thus in feare and not willing nor daring to come abroad, but to lie as priſoners in a Dongeon, wrote to the king to come thether in perſon, and to haue the honor of ſo high an enterprice: which writing ỳ kings counſail nothing alowed, for putting the king in ieoperdy vpō the chaunce of the ſea. Wherfore the king wrote charpely to him to accompliſh ỳ which appertayned to his duety: which cauſed him to take courage & to put things in aduenture as after you ſhal heare.

As you haue heard before, the Lorde Admirall of England laye ſtill on the coaſt of Britayne in the Baye, called Bartrames Baye, ſo that for feare of him and the Engliſhe Naue, neyther the great ſhippes in Breſt hauen 1513 durſt once moue to the ſea warde, nor yet Prior John for all hys ſtrong Galeies would once ſet out a ſayle: ſauyng nowe and then ſende forth hys ſmall Foyſtes, to make a ſhewe before the Engliſhe Naue, which chaſed them to their Baye, but becauſe the Engliſhe ſhippes were ſo great they could not enter the Bay, and ſo manned out Boates and tooke one of the beſt Foyſtes, and that with great daunger, for the Galies and the Bulwarkes ſhot all at one time, that it was a wonder howe the Engliſhe men eſcaped.

The Admirall of Englande perceyuing the Frenche mens pollicie, called a counſayle, and there determined firſt to aſſayle Prior John and his Galies, lyyng in Whitſand Baye, and after to ſet on the remnaunt in the hauen of Breſt. Then firſt was appointed that Water Lorde Ferrers, Syr Stephin Bull and other Capitaynes, ſhould go a lande with a conuenient companie, to aſſault the Bulwarkes of Whitſand bay, while the Lord Admirall entered with rowe Barges and little Galies into the Bay, ſo that the Frenchmen ſhould be aſſayled both by water and lande. Thus was it fully agreed by the whole counſayle: but alas, this Noble Capitaine counſayled by a Spaniſhe knight called Sir Alphons Charant (which ſayde that he might enter the Baye with little ieopardie) called to him William Fitz William, William Cooke, John Colley, and Sir Weſton Browne, as the chiefe and his moſt truſtie friends, and declared to them that the matter was little, and the honor great, if they onely tooke on them that enterpriſe, and let none other know of it. They like men of haute courage and deſiring honor, gladly aſſented: ſo on the. xxv. day of Aprill, the ſayde Admirall put himſelfe in a ſmall rowe Barge, with three other ſmall rowing ſhippes, and his owne ſhip Boate, and ſo rowed ſodainely into the Baye, where Prior John had mored his Galies iuſt to the grounde, which Galies with the Bulwarkes on the lande, ſhot ſo terribly that they that folowed were afrayde: but alone as he came to the Galies, he entred and draue out the French men. William Fitz Wylliam within his ſhip was ſore hurt with a quarell. The Baye was verie ſhalowe, and the other ſhippes could not enter, for the tide was ſpent, which thing the Frenchemen perceyuing, and that there couldе come no ſuccour to the Admirall, with Morris pikes entered againe the Galies, and fought with the Engliſhe men in the Galies. And the Admirall perceyuing their approching, thought to haue entred againe into his rowe Barge, which by violence of the tide was driuen downe the ſtreme, and ſo with a pike was throwne ouer the boorde and ſo drowned, and there the forenamed Alphons was ſlayne, and all the other Boates and veſſels eſcaped hardly, for if they had taried, the tide had fayled them, and they all had bene loſt. The Lord Ferrers and other Capitaines much were grieued with this chaunce, and ſome ſayde he did it without counſayle, and ſo he hath ſped. And therefore although that they would haue ſet on the Navie in Breſt hauen, yet hauing no Admirall nor commiſſion, they determined to do no farther till they knewe the kings pleaſure, and ſo ſayled into Englande. The French Navie perceiuyng that the Engliſhe men made toward England, came out of their Hauens, and Prior John ſet forth his Galies and Foiſtes, and coaſted Britayne and Normandie, and croſſed ouer to the coaſt of Suſſex and all hys companie, and landed on the ſea coaſt, and ſet fire on the poore Cotages. The gentlemen that dwelt neere, ſhortly rayſed the Countrie, and came to the coaſt and droue Prior John to hys Galies. This was all the hurt that this ſtoute Capitayne of ſo great fame did to Englande, ſauing he robbed certayne poore Fiſhermen of Whytings. The king hearing of the death of his Admirall was not a little ſorie, conſidering both the nobilitie of his birth, and the valyauntneſſe of his perſon, but all ſorrowe auayleth not when the chaunce is paſt. Therefore the king hearing that the French Nauie was abroade, called to him the Lorde Thomas Hawarde, elder brother to Syr Edward Haward late Admirall, and ſonne and heire apparaunt to the Erle of Surrey, and made hym Admirall, wylling hym to reuenge his brothers death, which with great reuerence, thanked the king of the highe truſt that he had put in him. And then immediatly went to the ſea, and ſo nobly and valyauntly did ſcowre the ſea, that the Frenche men had no luſt to keepe the coaſt of Englande, for he fought with them at their owne portes.

The Lorde Thomas Hawarde made Lorde Admirall.

The king which had all things neceſſarie and meete for the warre, entending to paſſe the ſea in proper perſon, appoynted the valiant Lord George Talbot Erle of Shrewesburie, and high ſteward of his houſhold to be Capitaine generall of his forewarde, and in his companie were Lorde Thomas Stanley Erle of Darbie, Lorde Decowrey Prior of Saint Johns, Syr Robert Radcliffe, Lorde Fitzwater, the Lorde Haſtinges, the Lorde Cobham, Syr Rice ap Thomas, Syr Thomas Blount, Syr Richard Sachuerell, Syr John Digbby, Syr John Aſkew, Syr Lewys Bagot, Syr Thomas Cornewall, and many knightes and Eſquiers and ſouldiours, to the number of eyght thouſand men, which all paſſed the ſea to Calice in the middle of May.

The Lord Herbert called ſir Charles Sommerſet, chiefe Chamberlaine to the king: the ende of the ſame Moneth with .vj. M. men paſſed the Sea in whoſe companie were theſe Erles, of Northūberland Percy, of Kent Gray, of Wilſhire Stafford, the Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Syr Thomas Weſt his ſonne, Syr Edwarde Huſey, Syr Robert Dimmoke, Syr Daup Owen, with many other Gentlemen, ſome with ſpeares on horſbacke, ſome with pikes on foote, ſome with Dimilaunces, and thys was the rereward. Such good diligence was made that theſe two Captaynes withall their company, furniſhed with artilerie, powder, tents, cariages, & al thinges neceſſary for the warres were landed at Calice the laſt day of May.

After they had ſoiourned certaine dayes in Calice, and that all thinges requiſite were readie, they cauſed a Trompet to blowe and made Proclamation, that euery man ſhould depart out of the towne, and ſo to begyn the campe. The Erle of Shrewesbury with his company firſt tooke the fielde, after him folowed the Lorde Herbert with his companie, in maner of a rereward. And after him folowed the valiaunt Rice ap Thomas, with fiue hundred light horſe and Archers on horſeback, and ioyned him to the forewarde. Then was there order taken what perſons ſhould conduyte the Victaylers, that came from Calice, and who ſhould conduyte the Victaylers that came out of Flaunders, for without ſufficient conduyte no creature durſt bring anye victaile to the armie. Theſe two Lordes thus embattayled remoued the .xviij. day of June to Sandiſtfielde, and on the .xviij. day they came to Margiſon, on the farre ſyde of the water, as though they would haue paſſed ſtreight to Bulleyn, but they thought otherwiſe, for the nert day they tooke another way, and coaſted the Countrie with ſuch diligence, that the .xxij. day of June, they with all their people, ordinaunce, and habiliments of warre, were come before the strong City of Tirwin, & pight their tents a mile from the towne, & for that night embattailed themselfe: and as certain Capitaines were in counsaile, in the Lorde Harbertes Tent, sodainly out of the towne was shot a Gonne, the Pellet whereof slue a noble Capitaine called the Baron of Carew, sittyng there in counsaile, which sodaine aduenture dismayed much the assembly. But the Lorde Harbert valiauntly comforted them, saiyng: this is the chaunce of warre, if it had hit me you must haue beene content, a noble heart in warre is neuer afearde of death. All the Countrie of Arthoys, and Picardie, fortified their holdes, and made shewes as the Englishe armie passed, but they durst not once assaile them.

The Citie of Tirwyn was strongly fortified with walles, rampires, Bulwarkes, with diuers fortresses in the ditches, which were so broade and so plumme steepe that was wonder to beholde. The Lorde Pountremy was Capitaine Generall, and with him were within the Citie fiue hundred horsemen furnished, and two thousand and fiue hundred Almaines, beside the Inhabitantes of the City, the walles and towers were full of ordinaunce, which did oftentymes great displeasure to the Englishmen. The Erle of Shrewsburie layde siege to the towne, on the Northwest syde, and the Lord Harbert on the East side or ende warde, the Frenchmen issued out of the towne, and skirmished with the Englishemen, but the Archers shot so fast that they draue the Frenchemen into the Citie, and slue and tooke diuers of them. The Lord Harbert which lay in the open sight of the Towne, hauyng no hill or other thing to succor or defende him, caused great Trenches to be made, and so mawger his enemyes, he approched very nere the Citie: likewise the Erle of Shrewsbury with the forewarde, gat into an hollow grounde or valey nere to the Citie. Dayly the Frenchemen shot at the Englishemen, and diuers tymes issued out and skirmished, and euer they lost by skirmishyng, but by shotyng of ordinaunce they hurt diuers Englishmen. Wherefore the Lordes commaunded the Pioners to rayse a great Trenche, in which they layde the great Ordinaunce, and dayly as they might they approched: Sir Rice ap Thomas with the horsemen dayly scoured the Countrie, and many tymes encountered with the Frenchemen, and slue and tooke dyuers prisoners, so that the Frenchemen drewe not towarde the siege, but turned another way. Upon the Monday beyng the .xxvij. day of June. xxiij. Cartes charged with vittaile, were by the garrison of Calice conducted to Guisnes, and there the crewe of the Castell and towne of Guisnes with three hundred footemen, vnder the conduyte of sir Edward Belknap, all beyng in number foure hundred. lx. men, set forth to conduite the sayd vittayles to the armie lying before Tirwin, and so they passed to Arde. And while the Cartes passed the towne, the horsemen fell a drinkyng in the way, and the footemen were all out of order. The Duke of Uandosme Capitaine generall of Picardie, which lay in a bushment in the Forest syde of Guysnes with .viij. hundred light horsemen, tooke his aduauntage, and set on the vitaylers: the Carters perceiuyng that, losed their horses and fled to the towne, which was but a myle off, and left their Cartes. Sir Nicholas Uaux Capitaine of Guisnes did all he coulde, to bring the footemen in an order: but the Frenchemen set on so quickly that they coulde not set them in order, the horsemen of Guisnes which were

It, shot manfully, and a noble Capitaine called Baltier Delien and diuers other, but the French men were so many in number, and in good order, that they slue. viij. Gentlemen of the Garison of Guisnes, and. xxx. Archers slaine, and many hurt, and so they distrussed the vittayles, and caused sir Nicholas Maur, and sir Edwarde Belknappe to flie toward Guisnes. This misaduenture fell by tarying of the horsemen, and breaking of array, for if the Archers had taryed together, it had happened otherwise, for the fewe Archers that helde together, slue and hurt diuers Frenchemen: for on the fielde lay. lxxviij. great horse, which neuer went thence, by the which it appered that the Frenchemen went not quite away without losse. When tidynges of this misaduenture came to the Lordes at the siege, they were not a little displeased: and sir Rice ap Thomas caused hys Trompet to blowe to the stirrop, and he with his horsemen sought the Duke of Vandosme all the Countrie, which heeryng of the comming of sir Rice, with great hast retreated backe to Bangey Abbey, where the French kinges great armie lay. Sir Rice heeryng that he was returned came the next day againe to the siege. The rumor of this skirmishe sprong all the English pale toward Flaunders, where the townes fiered their Bekons, and rang alarme, diuers honourable men that had passed the Sea with companies of Souldiours, and were in Calice, marched forwarde in order of battaile, but hearyng of the departure of Mounsire de Vandosme, they rested. Then was newe prouision made for vittaile, and sent dayly from Calice to Turwyn by suche conduyte, that the Frenche men would no more meddle, and the armie also was well vittayled out of Flaunders and Henawlde.

The armie of England thus lay before the strong Towne of Turwin: the noble king of England not forgetting his enterprice prepared al thing redy to passe the Sea in proper person, and caused Sir John Wilshire to purueye for thre hundred Hoyes to cary ouer his Artillerie and habilliments of warre and all his ships of warre were on the sea scowring euerie coast of his realme. And when all thinges were prest, he accompanied with many noble men and syre hundred archers of his garde, all in white gabberdines and capes, departed from his Manour royall of Grenewich the. xv. daye of June and so he and the Queene wyth small iorneys came to Douer Castell and there rested, and made the Queene gouernour of the realme, and commaunded William Warram then Bishop of Cantorburie and Sir Thomas Louell a sage knight and diuers other, to geue there attendaunce on the Queene. And commaunded the Erle of Surrey to drawe toward the north partes lest the Scottes would make any enterprice in his absence. Then the king tooke leaue of the Queene and of the Ladies which made such sorrowe for the departing of the Lordes their husbandes, that it was great dolour to behold, and so he with all his armie tooke shippe the last daye of June being the daye of Sainct Paule.

In the morning when the kyng was shipped and made saile, all the armye folowed to the number of foure hundreth shippes, and the winde was so that they were brought euen on the coast of Picardie open vpon Sainct Johnes Roade, and with the flood they haled along the coast of Whitesand with Trumpets blowing and Gonnes shootyng, to the great feare of them of Bulleyne which playnelye myght beholde this paſſage, and ſo came to Calyce hauen.

The king was receyued into a Bote couered with Arras, and ſo was ſet on lande. He was appareled in an almaine riuet creſted and hys vambrace of the ſame, and on his hedde a chapeau montabin with a riche coronall, the fold of the chapeau was lined with crimſen Satten, and on that a rich brooch witht the image of Sainct George, ouer hys riuet he had a garment of whit cloth of Gold with a red croſſe, and ſo he was receyued with proceſſion and with his deputie of Calyce called ſir Gilbert Talbotte, and all other nobles and gentelmen of the towne and countrie, and ſo entred in at the Lanterne Gate and paſſed the ſtretes tyll he came to Sainct Nicholas Church, and there he alighted and offered, and from thence he went to the Staple Inne where he ſupped.

When the kyng entred Caleyce, all the baniſhed men entered with hym and were reſtored to the libertie of the Towne. To tell of the gunneſhote of the Towne and of the ſhippes at the kinges landing it was a great wonder, for men of good eſtimacion reported that they heard it at Douer. The king lyng thus in Calyce, all his armye except a fewe of his counſaile and other that gaue their attendaunce on him, laye encamped at Newnam bridge, in which Campe about a.xj. of the clock at night there roſe an eſcrie, ſo that the Towne of Calyce began alarme, with that the king waked and came to the walles, and demaunded what the matter ment, the yomen of the tentes, called Richard Gibſon, ſhewed him howe that certaine horſemen and footemen of Fraunce proffered to come ouer the Hauen, and the archers that lay next the ſea ſide entred into the water & defended the paſſage, with which defence the Frenchmen returned, and ſo the king was ſatiſfied. But after this a Frenchman of Whitſand Bay and one of Bullain were taken, the one called Charles de Bone, the other Peter Vernowne, which confeſſed that from the towne of Whitſand came .lx. horſemen and two hundred footemen of the garriſon of Bullayne and the countrie adioyning, entending to paſſe by Rice Banke at the lowe water Marke, ouer the Hauen of Calice at a certeine Foorde ſhewed to them by a ſpye which ſerued the yoman of the tentes with vittailes, and ſhewed them that the tentes were pitched vnder Calyce walles betweene the towne and the campe, ſo that they might burne them quickly or the towne could iſſue, or the campe remoue. But the Engliſhmen kept ſo good watch as you haue heard that their enterprice came to none effect. The morowe after being the firſt day of July, the noble Lorde Hayward, admirall of England landed at Whitſand Bay, & entred, ſpoyled and brent the towne, and returned to his ſhippes for all the Bullonoys, and ſo recompenced the imagination that the Baillie of Whitſand and the Bullonoiſe had enterpriſed for the burning of the kings tentes.

On Friday at night blewe ſuche a ſtorme that ſeuered all the naule, and ſome were drowned. Upon the. viij. day of Julye, the Lorde Marques Dorſet, Erle of Eſſex, the Lorde Liſle rode into Flaunders, and there tooke the muſters of the Lord Linny, the Lorde Walon, ſonne to the Lorde of Barow, and baſtard Emery which with their retinue were then admitted into the kinges wages, and the Lord Linny with a hundred and fiftie ſperes was appoynted to go to the Lorde Harbert: and the Lord Walon, and Baſtard ſtard Emery with their bonds were appointed to go to the Erle of Shrewſbury lyng before Tirwin: Theſe ſtraũgers were warlike perſons on light horſes. While the ſiege laye thus before Tirwin as you haue heard, the French men diuers times iſſued out on horſebacke, and many a ſtaffe was broken, and many a proper feate of armes done. Likewyſe the Almaynes on foote would diuers times iſſue out, with Handgonnes, and Morriſpikes and aſſaile the Engliſhmen, but by force of ỹ archers, they were euer driuen home againe, and euery day the Engliſhemen ſhot at the towne and did them much diſpleaſure.

The. xrj. day of July (when all thinges by counſayle had bene ordered concernyng the order of battaile) the king paſſed out of the towne of Calice, in goodly array of battaile, and toke the field: And notwithſtandyng that the forewarde, and the rerewarde of the kinges great armye were before Tyrwin, as you haue heard: Yet the king of his awne battaile made three bat-tailes after the faſſion of the warre, the Lorde Liſle marſhall of the hoſte was Captaine of the foreward, and vnder him three thouſand men. Sir Ry-chard Carew with three. C. men was the right hand wing to the foreward, and the Lorde Darcy with three hundred men, was wing on the left hande, the ſcourers and forerynders of this battaile were the Northumberland men on light Geldynges. The Erle of Eſſex was Lieutenaunt Generall of the Speres, and ſir John Pechy was Vicegouernour of the horſemen: before the king went. viij. hundred Almaynes all in a plumpe by themſelues: after them came the Standard with the red Dragon, next the Banner of our Ladie, and next after the Banner of the Trinitie, vnder the ſame were all the kinges houſholde ſeruauntes, then went the Banner of the armes of England, borne by ſir Henry Guilforde, vnder which Banner was the king him-ſelfe, with diuers noble men and other to the number of three thouſand men.
The Duke of Buckyngham with fiue hundred men was on the kinges left hande, egall with the Almaynes, in likewiſe on the right hande was ſir Edwarde Bownynges, with other fiue hundred men egall with the Almaynes.
The Lorde of Burgaynie with. viij. hundred men, was wing on the ryght hande, ſir William Compton with the retinue of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Mayſter Wolſey the kinges Almoner to the number of. viij. hundreth was in maner of a rerewarde, ſir Anthony Oughtred, and ſir John Neuell with the kinges ſperes that folowed, were foure hundred, and ſo the whole armie were. xj. thouſand, and three hundred men. The Mayſter of the ordi-naunce ſet forth the kinges artillarie, as Fawcons, Slinges, Bombardes, Cartes with Powder, ſtones, Bowes, Arrowes, and ſuche other thinges neceſſary for the fielde, the whole number of the Cariages were. xiij. hun-dreth, the leaders and dryuers of the ſame were. xix. hundreth men, and all theſe were reckened in the battaile, but of good fightyng men, there were not full. ix. thouſande.

This was afterward Cardinall Wolſey.

Thus in order of battayle the king rode to Seutreyca and there lodged the firſt night, on Friday the garriſon of Bulleyne muſtered nighe to Fines Will, and were aſkried by the Northumberland men, which marched toward them, but the Frenchmen returned. On Saterday the hoſte remooued to Hambwell and there reſted. On Sunday, and on Monday he entered into the Frenche grounde nye to Arde, and there euery Gentleman had on hys

coate of armes, and these tydings were brought to the king that the frenche armie approched, which tidings pleased him well, for he desired nothing but battaile. Tuesday the. xxvj. day of Julie the king passed forward in order of battayle, and euer the French men costed a farre off to take the English men at some auantage, but they kept them so close in order, that they could not finde them out of array. Howbeit, by negligence of the Carters that mistoke the way a great Curtall called the John Euangelist, was ouerthrowne into a depe ponde of water, and could not quickly be recouered.

The king hearing that his enemies approched, leauing the Gonne (because the maister Carpenter sayde that he would shortly waye it out of the water) set forward his hoste, and in good order came to Doznham where is a fayre castell standing in a woode countrie, the Frenchmen were euer lurcking in the woods bewyng the kings conduite and order as he passed, and so he left the towne of Doznham on his right hand, and came to a Village on a little ryuer where the ordinance was pitched. And when the king came to the ryuer he perceyued that many gentlemen made daunger to enter into the riuer: Wherefore he alighted downe of his horse and without any more abode entred the riuer, then all other entred and came ouer. Then was tydinges brought to him that the Frenchmen were neere at hande, and would fyght that night: the king still abode in order of battayle, euer looking for the comming of the Frenchmen, and at night worde was brought that they were reculed, and then he entred into his tent.

The noble courage and valyauntnesse of a king.

Wednesday the. xxvj. daye of July the releffe of the speares brought in askrie, wherefore the king commaunded to blowe to the standarde, and auaunced his banner and tooke a fayre field or banke, abidyng the comming of the Frenchmen. The Capitaynes generall of the armie of the frenche king were the Lorde de la Palice, and the Lorde of Piens, accompanied with the Duke of Longuyle, the Erle of saint Polle, the Lord of Flozinges, the Lorde Cleremound, and Richarde de la Pole Traytor of Englande, sonne to the Duke John of Suffolke: with these Captaines were comming a. xj. thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, all prest in battaile and came within two myles of the king of England, and there the footemen staled and came no farther: certayne horsemen to the number of three thousand & aboue marched forward and at the end of a wood shewed themselues open in the sight of the Englishe armie. The king perceyuing their demeanure, commaunded all his footemen not to remoue, but to stande still. The Frenchmen remoued and came somewhat neerer to a place of execution: then the maister Gonner shot of a peece of artillarie or two. As the king lay thus still abidyng his enemyes, and that the horsemen stoode still in sight, the great armie of Fraunce approched, which the Englishemen could not descry because of an hill that was betwixt them. The Northren men ranne to the Frenchmen, which manly encountered with them, and strake some of them downe, and mawger all their power brought certaine prisoners to the king of England. The Erle of Ellser Capitaine of the kinges speres, with two hundred speres lay in a stale, if the french men had come nerer. Then sodainly appered in sight a great companie of horsemen, and the king knewe not what they were: but at the last it was perceyued that it was the valiaunt knight sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, which came to the king about noone:

noone: which gently receyued him and sent him to the Erle of Esser, which incontinently departed and compassed the hill, and came to the Erle, and whē they were ioyned, they drewe them about the hill accompanied wyth Syr Thomas Gylford Capitaine of two hundred Archers on horsebacke, to the entent to haue set on the French men, which perceiuyng that, and doubtyng a more number to come after, sodainly drew backe and ioyned them with the great battaile. Then the Erle of Esser and the Englishe horsemen folowed them till they came nere the great armie of Fraunce, and then staied, and sent light horsemen to know the conduite of the Frenche army. When the French men of armes were returned to their battaile, both the footemen and horsemen reculed in order of battaile, and went backe apace. The Englishe stirrers perceiuyng this, folowed three leagues and returned to the Erle, makyng report of that they had seene, and then he brake vp his staie and came to the king, declaryng to him howe the Frenchmen were reculed. This day was called the drie Wednesday, for the day was wonderfull hote, and the king and his armie were in order of battaile from fiue of the clocke in the mornyng, till three of the clock in the after noone, and some died for lacke of moysture, and almost in generall euery man was burned about the mouth with heat of the stomacke, for drinke lacked, and water was not nere. After this, the king remoued toward Tirwyn, hauyng his horsemen behind him, least the french men shoulde sodainlye set on him behinde, and as the king was settyng forward, the Lorde Walowne of Flaunders came to the king with his horsmen which were in the kinges wages, and the king declared to him what had chaunced. As the army passed by negligence the same day in a Lane, was ouerthrowne one of the kinges great Bombards of Iron, called the red Gon, and there left: When the night began to approche, the king rested and tooke his campe two miles from Saint Omers on the Northside.

On the Thursday beyng the. xxviij. daye of July the mayster Carpenter with an hundred Carpenters and labourers without knowlege of the Marshall went to waye vp the great Gonne that was in the ponde as you haue heard, and by force of engines drewe it vp and layde it on a Cart ready to carie: But sodainely out of a wood issued eyght hundred Frenchmen with speares, crosbowes, and handgonnes, and assayled the poore labourers which valyauntly defended themselues: but oppressed with multitude, the most part was slayne and the remnant taken, and they and the peece of ordinaunce caried to Bulleyne. This misaduenture fell, for the maister Carpenter would worke all of his awne head without counsaile, with which chaunce the king was sore displeased. The Frenchmen ioyous of this chaunce, assembled a great number to take the other Gonne that laye still in the high waye. Wherefore the Lorde Barnes beyng Capitayne of the Pioners and laborers hearing of the misaduenture, and considering that the other Gonne was lyng behinde, prepared all maner of engines to recouer the same. The morrow after the king entending to rayse his Campe, but when he heard of the great peece of Ordinaunce that was left behinde, and that the Frenche men assembled together, he was in a great musing and so tarryed and commaunded the Almaynes to retreate backe, and to succour them that went for the peece of Ordinaunce. The Almaynes went forth and staied wythin two Myle, where the peece of Ordinaunce lay, and farther they would not go.

The

The Erle of Eſſex with his companye of ſpeares, Sir Rice ap Thomas, with his companie, ſyr John Neuell with the Northumberlande men, ſet forward to helpe the Lorde Barnes for recouery of the Gonne. And ſodainly the Northren horſemen eſpied where all the great armie of the Frenche men were comming forwarde, and ſo reported to the Erle of Eſſex, that to Sir John Pechy Lieutenaunt of the horſemen and ſpeares and other Capitaines, which were in the place where the ſayde Gonne was left with a hundred horſemen, which hearing thereof ſent worde to Sir Rice, and he hearing thereof deſired the Erle of Eſſex to come and to take grounde in that place where he was, which remooued in great haſte: In the meane ſeaſon by the diligent labor of the Lorde Barnes, the peece of Ordinaunce was raiſed and carted, and forth was it caryed, by thys time the Frenche armye appered in ſight.

When the Erle of Eſſex ſaw the great number of the Frenchmen, in all haſte he ſent to the Lord Walon, wylling him with his companie to come to their ayde, the Lorde Walon ſayde to the meſſenger, go tell your Capitayne that I come hether to ſerue the king of Englande more then one daye, and therefore I would all the Engliſh men would returne, for with the great power of Fraunce they be not able to fight, for I eſteeme them. ix. or. x. thouſand men at the leaſt: with this aunſwere the meſſenger departed and made relation to the Erle of Eſſex and other Capitaynes, which therewith were ſore diſcontent: by this time the ſcowrers of the French part were come hard to the handes of the Engliſhemen: then began the light horſemen to ſkirmiſhe, there was folowyng and reſcuing on both parties, and in open ſight ſome of both parties ſlayne. Then marched forward the whole battayle of the Frenchmen with ſtandards, penons, and banners wauerying, and ſumptuous bards, and riche harneſſe glyttering, the men of armes in great number were in ranges along ready to chace and charge. Sir Rice ap Thomas beyng a man of great experience, ſagely perceyued in what caſe the matter ſtood, ſaide to the Erle of Eſſex, ſir we be not ſeuen hundred horſemen, let vs not be to foliſhe hardy, our commiſſion was to fet the Gonne and none other, let vs folowe the ſame, the Erle agreed therto, and ſo ſoftly and not in fliyng maner retreated and folowed the Gonne. The Frenchmen perceiuyng that, cryed all is ours, let vs followe, then pricked forward two thouſand men of armes, and came iuſt to the backes of the Engliſhe men, then the Engliſhe men cryed Saint George, and caſt themſelfe about and made returne to the Frenche men, Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharpe, were the firſt that charged and after all the other Engliſhe men, there was a dreadfull chaſe, for the men of armes of Fraunce fledde ſo faſt, that glad was he that might be formoſt, the whole hoſt ſeeyng their horſemen returnyng in flight, ſodainly in great haſte returned without any more doyng. Then the Erle of Eſſex ſtaled to an hill, and there cauſed his Trompet to blowe to the Standard for feare of ſubtyll dealyng: and when they were gathered together vnto array, he returned.

The. xxix. daye of July the king with his armye came to Arkus, and there embattailed himſelfe in a ſtrong grounde, and to hym came the Erle of Eſſex and the other Capitaines with the gonne, and made report of their aduenture, which thanked them hartily, and there he lay till Monday in which time time came many noble men of Flaunders to visit him, and many of the common people came to se him.

Mundaye the first daye of August, the king remoued his campe to a village myddell way betweene Sainct Omers and Tyrwine, and there fell such a rayne that the ordinaunce coulde scarce be remoued, the erable ground was so softe.

Thursedaie the fourth daye of August, the king in good order of battaile came before the City of Tyrwyn and planted his siege in most warlike wise, his campe was enuironed with artillary, as Fawcons, serpentines, cast hagbusches, and tryed harowes, spien trestyles, and other warlicke defence for the sauegard of the campe. The king for himselfe had a house of timber with a chimney of Iron, and for his other lodginges he had great and goodlye tentes of blew water worke garnished with yellow & white, & diuers romes within the same for all officers necessarie, on the top of the Pauilions stoode the kinges besles holding kanes, as the Lion, the Dragon, the Greyhound, the Antelope, the Donne Kowe: within all the lodginge was poynted full of the sunnes rising, the lodging was a hundred. xxv. foote in length. Tyrwyn besieged.

The king lying before Tirwyn, his great ordinaunce sore beate the towne walles, and they within likewise shotout of the towne ordinaunce, and slew diuers Englishmen in the trenches, among whych shottes they had one gonne that euery day and night was ordinarilie shotte at certaine howers without fayle: this gonne was of the Englishmen called the whistelyng gonne, but it neuer did harme in the kinges field. The siege thus lying before the Citie of Tirwyn, Sir Alexander Baynam a Capitaine of the Miners, caused a myne to be enterprised to enter into the towne, but the Frenchmen perceyuing that, made a countermine and so destroyed the other mine, and diuers Miners slaine within the same. The French armie euer houed a farre to take the Englishmen at auantage as they went a forraging, and many a skirmish was done, and many good feates of armes achieued on both sides, and diuers prisoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certayne lyght horsmen called Stradiotes with short styrropes, beuer hattes, small speres, and swordes like Semiteries of Turkey: diuers times the Northen light horsemen vnder the conduite of sir John Neuell skirmished with these stradiottes and tooke diuers of them prisoners, and brought them to the king.

While the kyng laye thus before Tirwyn, the Capitayne of Bullen knowyng by his Espialles that manye of the garrison of Caleice were with the king at the siege, and also that daylie vittailes were brought out of Englande to Caleyce to succour the campe, imagined a great enterprice, and sent for all the men of warre vnder his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honor they should obtayne if they hurted or spoyled the out partes of Caleice, the king of England being on that side the Sea. The men of warre perceyuing the good courage of the Capitayne, assented to his purpose, and so with al dilligence they to the number of a thousand men in the euening set forward, and came to Newnam bridge by three of the clocke in the mornyng and founde the Watchmen that kept the Bridge a sleepe, and so entred the Bulwarke and slewe the watchmen, and toke the ordinaunce of the Bridge and then set the Bridge fall, so that all entred that would. The Capitaine of Bulleyne kept sixt hundred men for a stale at the bridge, and sent the other into into the marrithes and medowes where the cattel fed, and some of the frenche men came to Calice gate, and were aſcried of the watche, and ſo rang alarme: the Engliſhe ſouldiours ranne to the walles, and ſaw the Frenchmen without the towne walles: then they knew that Newnam bridge was loſte, and would haue iſſued out, but Sir Gylbert Talbot Deputie there, would not ſuffer any gate to be opened. Nowe it happened that without Calice gates were Richarde Hunnyng and Richard Bricks of the Caterie, and three or foure of the kings ſeruaunts which lay there to ſend prouiſions to the hoſte: which hering of this alarme, called to them the kings bakers, and coupers and a fewe chipmen, whith lay in the hauen, and courageouſly followed the Frenchmen. The Engliſhe men were not paſt fiue ſcore perſons, and ſet on the Frenchmen as they were a forragyng or they might aſſemble together, and ſlue them downe right and toke no priſoners in maner, and ſo they came to Newnam bridge and toke it, & put the Frenchmen back. But or the Engliſh men had thus gathered themſelues together, the Frenchmen had forraged all within the ryuer vp to ſaint Peters, and had driuen away the Cattel and the ordinance of Newnam bridge, and ſo paſſed till they came where the ſtale lay, and there they taried looking for there company that were gone a forraging to Calice walles. About fiue of the clock in the morning, the gate of Calice called Bulleyne gate was opened, and then iſſued out one Culpoper the vnder Marſhall with two hundred archers, wyth the Banner of Saint George, and with great haſte came to Newnam bridge, where they founde the kings ſeruauntes, and the other that had wonne the bridge, and then they altogether marched towarde the Frenchmen which kept the ſtale. The frenchmen thought it had bene their owne company that had returned, till they ſawe the banner of Saint George, then they knew that their company were ouerthrowne, and that they muſt needes fight or dye. Then the Engliſhe men though they were the ſmaller number, valyauntly ſet on the Frenchmen, which with great force them defended, but at the laſt they were all diſcomfited, and .xxiij. ſlayne and .xij. ſcore taken priſoners and their ordinaunce and whole bootie recouered. Theſe priſoners were brought to Calice, and there ſold in open market: Among all other a Cowper of the towne of Calice bought a priſoner of this bootie that dwelt in Bulleyn, and had of the priſoner a hundred Crownes for his raunſome, and when the money was paide, the Frenchmen prayed the Cowper to ſee him ſafe deliuered and to conduite him out of daunger, the Cowper gently graunted and without any knowlege of his friends, all alone went with the french man till he came beyond the cawſey and there would haue departed: but the Frenchman perceiued that the Cowper was aged, and that no reſcues were nie, by force toke the Cowper priſoner and caried him to Bulleyn, and made him pay two hundreth Crownes for his raunſome, thus through folly was the poore Cowper decraued.

The .xj. day of Auguſt beyng Thurſday, the king lyng at the ſiege of Tirwyn, had knowlege that Maximilian the Emperour was in the towne of Ayze. The king prepared all thinges neceſſary to meete with the Emperour in tryumph. The noble men of the kinges campe were gorgiouſly apparelled, their courſers barded of cloth of Golde, of Damaſke and broderie, there apparell all Tiſſue, cloth of Gold and Siluer, and Goldſmithes worke, great great Chaines of Bawdericks of gold, and Belles of Bullion, but in especial the Duke of Buckingham, he was in purple Satten, his apparel, & his bard full of Antelops and Swannes of fine golde Bullion & full of spangles, and little Belles of golde, marueylous costly & pleasant to beholde. The king was in a garment of great riches in Jewels, as pearles & stone, he was armed in a light armure, the mayster of hys hoyse folowed him with a spare hoyse the henrmen folowed bearyng the kings peeces of harnesse, euery one mounted on a great courser, the one bare the helme, the second his graūgard, the third his spere, the fourth his are, and so euery one had something belonging to a man of armes: the apparell of the .ix. henrmen were whyte cloth of gold and crymsyn cloth of gold richly embrawdered w̄ Goldsmithes worke, the trappers of the coursers were mantell harnesse coulpened, and in euery bent a long Bell of fine gold, & on euery pendant a depe tassell of fine gold in bullio, which trappers were very rich. The king & the Emperor met betwene Ayre and the campe, in the fowlest weather that lightly hath bene sene. The Emperor gently entertayned the king, & the king likewise him, and after a little communication had betwene them, because the weather was foule, departed for that tyme. The Emperor and all his men were at that daye all in blacke cloth, for the Empresse his wife was lately deseased. After that the king was thus returned to his campe, within a day or twain there arriued in the army a king at armes of Scotland called Lion with his coat of armes on his back and desired to speake with the king, who within short time was by Garter chiefe king at armes brought to the kinges presence, where he beyng almost dismayed seyng the king so nobly accompanied, with few wordes, & meetely good reuerence, deliuered a letter of defiaunce to ỹ king, which receyued the letter & red it himselfe, & when he had red it, without any more delay he himselfe answered after this sort. Now we perceyue the king of Scots our brother in law & your maister to be the same person whom we euer toke him to be, for we neuer estemed him to be of any truth and so now we haue found it, for notwithstanding his othe, his promise in the word of a king, & his awne hand & seale, yet now he hath broken his fayth & promise to his great dishonor and infamie for euer, and intendeth to inuade our realme in our absence, which he durst not once attempt our person beyng present. Therefore tell thy maister, first that he shal neuer be cōprised in any league wherin I am a confederate, & also that I suspecting his truth (as nowe the deede proueth) haue left an Erle in my realme at home, which shall be able to defende him and all hys power, for we haue prouided so, that he shall not finde our lande destitute of people as he thinketh to doe: but thus say to thy mayster, that I am the verie owner of Scotlande, and that he holdeth it of me by homage, and in so much as now contrarie to his bounden duetie he being my vassall, doth rebell against me, with Gods helpe I shall at my returne expulse him hys realme, and so tell him. Sir sayde the king of Armes, I am his naturall subiect, and he my naturall Lorde, and that he commaundeth me to saye, I may boldly say with fauour, but the commaundements of other I maye not, nor dare not saye to my souereigne Lorde, but your letters maye with your honor sent declare your pleasure, for I may not say such wordes of reprochе to him whome I owe onely my allegeaunce and faith. Then sayde the king, wherefore came you hether, will you receyue no answere? yes sayde Lyon, on, your aunſwere requireth doing, that is, that immediatly you ſhould returne home: well ſayd the king I will returne to your domage at my pleaſure, and not at thy maiſters ſomonyng. Then the king commaunded Garter to take hym to his Tent and make hym good cheere. And foorthwith king Henry wrote to him an aunſwere with verie ſharpe and grieuous wordes reproouing his vntruth.

After the defiaunce declared by the king of Scottes herauld, the king of Englande wrote to the Queene and other which he had left behinde of hys counſaile, to prepare in all haſt for the defence of the ſayde kyng of Scottes, which did ſo with great diligence as you ſhall heare hereafter. While the kyng lay thus at ſiege before Turwyn, the Frenchmen ſtudied all the wayes poſſible to vittail the Towne of Turwyn, & imagined in a night by ſome way to conuey vittayle to the Towne: wherfore euerie day they ſent their Stradiates to eſpie by which way they might take their moſt auantage, and many times the Engliſh horſemen met with the Stradiates & ſlew diuers of them.

The Frenche king would in any wiſe that the king of England ſhoulde be fought with all, wherefore he ſent the Duke of Uandoſme, The Duke of Longuile with diuers other valiaunt Cayptaynes of Blangeoy. Then was there a concluſion taken that the Duke of Alanſon ſhoulde with fiue thouſande men fight with the Erle of Shrewesburie, or elſe to keepe that neyther he neyther the Lord Harbert ſhould ayde or come to the kinges battayle, and with the king ſhould ſkirmiſh the Duke of Uandoſme and Longuile, while in the meane ſeaſon the cariages with vittayle might enter the towne. For accompliſhing of this enterpriſe, the Frenchmen made great puruepaunce and all on horſebacke, this was not ſo ſecretely concluded, but the king of Englande had an inckeling thereof, and ſent worde to the Emperour which lay at Ayre and knewe nothyng of this deuice: and deſired him to come to the Campe to haue his aduiſe, which gladly anſwered that he would come the morrowe after. The king continuallye ſent forth his light horſes to ſeke the countrie and to ſee if any apparaunce were, and they euer brought tydinges of ſuch thing as they ſaw, ſo that alwayes it was foreſeene that the kyng nor hys people ſhould be taken vnpuruyed, nor the Frenchmen ſhould not come on them ſodainly vnaſkryed.

While theſe thinges were thus in comunication, the Emperour Maximilian and all his ſeruantes which were retayned with the king of England in wages by the day, euery perſon according to his degre, and the Emperour as the kinges Souldiour ware a Croſſe of ſaint George with a Roſe, and ſo he and all his trayne came to the kinges campe the. xiij. daye of Auguſt beyng Fryday, and there was receyued wyth great magnificence and brought to a Tent of cloth of Golde all ready apparailed according to his eſtate, for all the tent within was ſeeled with cloth of Gold and blew veluet, and all the veluet was embrodered with. H. K. of fine Golde, and his Cupboorde was richely furniſhed, and officers appoynted to geue on him attendaunce: and there he taried till Sunday, and from thence he went againe to Ayre for hys pleaſure. The king and his Counſayle were enformed by their eſpyalles, and alſo it was confeſſed by certaine priſoners, howe the French army which lay at Blangeoy entended to vittaile the Citie of Tirwyn. Wherfore on Fryday at night the. xiij. day of Auguſt, the Duke of Buckingham, the Erle of Eſſex, Eſſex, the Marques Dorſet, the Lorde of Burgayny, the Lord Willoughby, and diuers other Gentlemen, with fiue thouſand men on foote, and the Lord Walon, and the Lorde Ligny with their horſemen, were layd at Gingate on the Southſyde of Tirwyn, where they were all night in order of battaile, awaityng the reſcue of the Citie, but the Engliſh men were aſcryed, and ſo the French men brake their purpoſe for that time: and ſo the Duke of Buckingham and his companyons returned to the campe. Monday the .xvj. day of Auguſt by infortune, without any cauſe knowen, there fell a great debate betwene the Almaynes of the kinges fielde, and the Engliſhe men, inſomuch that they fell to fightyng, and many men ſlaine, the Almaynes ſodainly ran to the kinges ordinaunce and tooke it, and embattayled themſelues, and bent the ordinaunce agaynſt the king and his campe. The Engliſhe men were greatly vnquieted with this matter: inſomuch that the Archers ſet forwarde to haue ioyned wyth the Almaynes, and they likewiſe prepared their Pykes, but the Capitaynes tooke ſuche paine that the fraye was appeaſed, and all thinges done for that tyme, but as this commocion was in trouble, the Emperour came from Ayze, and ſawe all the demeanor of both parties, and was glad to ſee the diſcrete handlyng of the Capitaynes. After the Emperor was come to the kinges field, the king called the Emperour and all the Lordes of his Counſail together, aſſerteinyng them that he was credibly informed that the Frenchemen entended to reſcue the Citie of Tirwyn: wherefore it was agreed that the mayſter of the ordinaunce ſhould in haſte make fiue Bridges ouer the water, for the army to paſſe ouer, to the entent to beſiege the Citie on that ſyde: the Carpenters did ſo theyr deuer that night, ſo that by day all the Bridges were made, ſo that all the horſemen paſſed ouer and aſcryed the Countrie. On Tueſday the .xvij. day of Auguſt, the king rayſed his campe, and with great ordinaunce, and all other artillarie and cariage he paſſed the ryuer, and to him came ſir John Neuell with his light horſemen, and tolde him that behinde the Tower of Gyngate was a great plumpe of horſemen. In the meane ſeaſon, as Sir Jhon Neuell tolde the king theſe tidynges, by another waye was the Erle of Eſſex, ſir John Peche, and the kinges Speres paſſed and ſkirmiſhed with the plumpe of Speres that Sir John ſpake of, and there were many profers made on both ſydes, but in concluſion the French men were compelled to leaue their ſtale and one horſeman taken and ſent to the king, which in hope of pardon of his raunſome, ſhewed howe that the Frenche armie with their full power and ſtrength were commyng from Blangeoy the number of fiftene thouſand horſemen of armes to ayde Tirwyn on ỳ ſyde of the water. And to the entent that the army of the Lord Stuarde, and the Lord Chamberleyne ſhould not ayde the king, there were appoynted fiue thouſand of the .xv. thouſande horſemen on the other ſyde of the water.

As theſe tidynges was tolde, came one from Sir Rice, and ſayde that a priſoner that he had that day taken cõfeſſed that the City ſhould be reſcued the ſame daye, & that he had aſcried a number of horſmen to his iudgement vpon the poynt of fiue thouſand. Then ſodainlye came the Northzen men which affirmed that they had ſeene the Frenche armie in order of battaile commyng forwarde, but they iudged them not paſt. xij. thouſand men. Then the kinges field was pitched, and the ordinaunce ſet, but ſome coun-ſayled the king to take downe his Tentes, but the king ſayd I will this day that my fielde be made and ſet in as royall wyſe as may be, and all my riche Tentes ſet vp, which was done. Then the king called the Lorde Darcy, and commaunded him to keepe his fielde, treaſure, ordinaunce, and other ſtuffe, which was loth to go from his maiſter but by ſtrait commaundement. Then euery man prepared himſelfe to battail reſorting to the Standard, the horſmen marched before the footemen by the ſpace of a myle, ſtill came currours bering tidyngs that the Frenche army approched. The king had ſet forward and to aduaunce his Banner in the name of God and Saint George. The Almaynes ſeyng this (to what purpoſe it was not knowen) ſodainly emparayled themſelues on the left hand of the king, & left the breaſt or front of the kinges battaile bare. As the king was thus marchyng forward toward the battaile, to him came the Emperour Maximilian with. xxx. men of armes, he and all his companie armed in one ſute with red Croſſes: Then by the counſaile of the Emperour the king cauſed certain peeces of ſmall ordinance to be layde on the top of a long hill or banke for the out ſcowrers: Thus the kinges horſemen and a fewe Archers on horſebacke marched forward. The king woulde faine haue beene afore with the horſemen, but his Counſaile perſwaded him the contrary, and ſo he tarryed with the footemen accompanied with the Emperour.

The Frenchmen came on in thre ranges. xxxvj. mens thickneſſe and well they perceyued the kynges battayle of footemen marching forewarde: the Erle of Eſſex Capitayne of the horſemen, and Syr John Peche with the kinges horſemen and the Burgonions to the number of a. xj. hundreth ſtode with banner diſplayed in a valley. The Lorde Wallon and the Lorde Ligny wyth baſtard Emery and their bende to the number of foure hundred horſemen ſeuered themſelues and ſtode aſyde from the Engliſhmen: ſo then the Engliſh men were but ſeuen hundred, yet they with banner diſplayde remoued vp to the toppe of the hill, and there they met with Syr John Gylford a hundred talle Archers on horſebacke, which had aſkryed the Frenchmen. Nowe on the toppe of the hill was a faire plaine of good ground, on the left hand a lowe wood, and on the right hand a falowe field. The Lorde Wallon and the Burgonions kept them a looſe, then appered in ſight the Frenchmen with banners and ſtandards diſplayed. Then came to the Capitaynes of the Engliſhmen of armes, an Engliſh officer of armes called Clarenſeur and ſayd in Gods name ſet forwarde, for the victorie is youres for I ſee by them they wyll not abyde, and I will goe wyth you in my coate of Armes. Then the horſemen ſet forwarde, and the Archers alighted and were ſet in order by an hedge all along a Village ſide called Bompe: the Frenchmen came on with. xxxiij. ſtandardes diſplayed, and the Archers ſhotte a pace and galled their horſes, and the Engliſh ſperes ſet on freſhly, cryng Saint George, and fought valiauntlye with the Frenchmen and threw downe their ſtandarde, the duſt was great and the cry more, but ſodaynly the Frenchmen ſhocked to their ſtandard and fled, and threw away their ſperes, ſwordes, and maſes and cut of the bards of their horſes to run the lighter, when the hinder part ſaw the former part flye, they fled alſo, but the ſoner for one cauſe which was this. As the Engliſh horſemen mounted vp the hyll, the ſtradiates were comming downewardes on the one ſide of the hill before the French hoſte, which ſodainely dainely saw the banners of the Englishe horsemen, and the kinges battaile following vpwarde, thinkyng to them that all had bene horsemen, then they cast themselues about and fled, the Frenchmen were so fast in array that the Stradiates could haue none entrie, & so they ran stil by the endes of the ranges of the French army: and when they behind saw the fall of the standardes and their Stradiates in whome they had great confidence returne, they that were farthest of fled first, then vp prannced the Burgonyons and folowed the chace: this battayle was of horsemen to horsemen, but not in egall number, for the Frenchemen were ten to one, which had not bene seene before tyme, that the Englishe horsemen gate the victorie of the men of armes of Fraunce. The French men call this battaile the iourney of Spurres, because they ranne away so fast on horsebacke. This battaile was the. xvj. day of August, in the which battaile was taken the Duke of Longuile, Loys brother to the Erle of Dunoys, which had maryed the Marques of Rutilons heyre, the Lorde Cleremounde, and many other noble men, to the number of .xij. score, and all brought to the kinges presence, and likewise all the standerds and banners, were brought to the king. The Burgonions kept their prisoners and brought them not to fight. The fame went that Mounsire de la Palayce was by them taken and let go. The Englishemen folowed the chase three mile long from the fielde to a water in a valley, and there a Frenchman sayde to sir Gyles Capell, that one day they would haue a day, which answered him againe in French that it was a bragge of Fraunce: and so the Englishemen returned to the king, which was comnyng forwarde, who gaue them thanks with great prayslngs for their valiauntnesse, and there he made Sir John Peche Bannaret, and made John Car knight, which was sore hurt, and sir John Peche had his gaydehorne taken, and diuers of his men hurt, they folowed so farre. Then the king retreated to Gingate, to whome came Sir Rice, and shewed him howe hote the Frenchmen had skirmished wyth hym all daye on the other syde of the ryuer, and howe the Erle of Shrewesbury with Banner displayed was all day prest in order of battaile to haue fought with the Duke of Alanson, and the Erle of Saint Poll, and the Lord Florenges, which with fiue thousand men as you haue heard were appoynted to rescue the towne on that syde where the Lord of Shrewsbury lay, and to let him to come to ayde the king, but howe soeuer that it happened they stoode still and came not downe, but onely skirmished with sir Rice: the Citie of Tirwyn was this day in hope of ayde, and when they sawe their helpers comming nere, they the same day prowdely issued out on the Lord Harbart, and skirmished with his people very valiauntly, and they within also shot out ordinaunce of all partes. The Lorde Harbert and his Capitaynes couragiously defended them, and so sore they set on the French men, that they draue them by force to their gates for all their succours, and many of them were slaine: this night the king sent for the Duke of Longuile, and the Lord Cleremounde, and diuers other noble men, and the Duke supped at the kinges boorde that night. The iourney of Spurres.

Then the Frenchmen after this discomfiture assembled together and returned to Blangoy. xij. mile from the coste and there talked of their losses, and because they knew not who were taken, and who were slaine, therefore they sent an Herault to the king to knowe the number of the prisoners, the kings counsayle according to their desire sent to them the names. The king beyng assertayned that the French kinges purpose was yet agayne to geue him battayle, commaunded the best of the prisoners should be conueyed to the towne of Ayze in Flaunders: but when the English men had brought them thether, the Capitayne denied that the Englishe men should enter the towne with prisoners of Fraunce, with whom he & his Countrie had peace: but if the Frenchmen would desire lodging for their ease, they should be permitted to enter. But the Englishe men in a furie aunswered, that if you will not suffer vs to keepe our prisoners, we will slay them: then the frenchmen meekely prayed the Capitayne to suffer the English men to enter, and sware to their keepers to be true prisoners, and so they entered, and after were conueyed into England. The Lorde Powntremy of the house of Bresquy Capitayne generall of Tyrwyn perceyued the discomfiture of the Frenche partie, and perceyued how the Erle of Shrewsburie and the Lord Harbert had brought thether great ordinaunce so nere the towne, that neerer it could not be brought, and that in the walles was such batterie that it was not like to continue, yet he manfully defended the Citie and shot Gonnes euery day as he was accustomed and neuer was in dispaire, till the. xviij. daye of the sayde moneth, he saw the king remoue his Campe from Gyngate and layde his Campe on the South side of the towne betweene their rescue and the towne: then when he sawe this, and considered that his succours were put back, and that the towne was sore feebled, and that the kings greatest ordynance was bent agaynst the towne, he therefore by the aduise of other Capitaynes sent to the Erle of Shrewesburie and the Lord Harbert a Trumpet, desiring abstinence of warre for a day, they incontinent sent to the king to knowe his pleasure, the king aunswered that he would not graunt till he knewe the consideration: then the Capitaine sent worde that with safeconduyte he would come and speake with the kings counsayle, which to him was graunted, then he sent certaine Commissioners which offered to delyuer the towne with all the ordinaunce and munitions without anye fraude, so that the townes men that would there dwell might haue life and goodes safe, and that the men of warre might depart with horse and harnesse, for goodes they sayde they had none, and there horse and harnesse was of little valure to so great a prince. After that the king and his counsaile had debated this matter, it was answered the commissioners, that although the king knewe their penurie of victayle and the daylie mortalitie among them, and that the towne by reason of great batteries was not able long to resist, yet because they asked mercie he would not extend rigor, and graunted their request: so that they delyuered the towne with all the ordynance, as they had promised, to the which all they were sworne, and so returned. And the same night the Erle of Shrewsburie entred the towne and had the walles and towres and the Banner of saint George was set in the highest place in signe of victorie, and the Lord Powtremy with all the garrison departed with horse and harnesse according to the appointment. Then the Lorde George Talbot Erle of Shrewesburie, with three hundred men serched the towne for feare of treason or that any inconuenience might be vnto the king and his people: and after that he sawe all thing sure, he called all the townes men together, and sware them to be true to the king of England. When all this was done, the king king on the. xiiij. day of Auguſt entered into the Citie of Tyrwyn at. ix. of the clock before noone with great triumph and honour, his perſon was apparéled in armure guylt and grauen, his garment and barde purple Veluet full of bordérs, & in all places trauerſed wyth braunches in runnyng worke of fyne Golde, the braunches were of hawthorne wrought by Goldſmithes craft, wound with a braunche of Roſes, and euery flower, leafe, and Burie, were enbolſſed: after whom folowed his Henrmen with the pieces of armure accuſtomed. Thus with great glorie this goodly Prince entered and tooke poſſeſſion of the towne of Tyrwyn, and was receaued at the Cathedrall Church with procéſſion, and there dyned in the Byſhops palace, and at after noone returned to his Campe, leauing in the towne the Erle of Shreſwéſburie with his retinue. The. xxvj. day of Auguſt the king remoued agayne to Gyngate, and there it was agreed that the walles, gates, bulwarkes and towres of Tyrwyn ſhould be defaced, raſed and caſt downe: of which concluſion the Emperour ſent worde to Saint Omers, and to Ayre, which beyng ioyous of that tydings (for Tyrwyn was to them a ſcourge) ſent thether Pyoners with all maner of inſtruments, and ſo they and the Engliſhe Pyoners brake downe the walles, gates, and towres of the foundation, and filled the diches, and fired the towne, except the Cathedral Church and the Palace, and all the ordinaunce was by the king ſent to Ayre, to be kept to hys vſe. After this, it was concluded that the king in perſon ſhould lay his ſiege to the Citie or towne of Turney: wherfore he ſet forward three goodly battayles, the firſt was conduyted by the Erle of Shrewéſburie, the ſeconde battayle the king led himſelfe with whome was the Emperour. The rereward was conduyted by the Lorde Harbert: and ſo the firſt night they lay in Campe beſide Ayre, which night vitayle was ſcant, diuers Engliſh men taried in Tyrwyn when the king was paſt for pillage, and fired certaine houſes, on whom came ſodainly the French Stradiates, and ſome they ſlue, and ſome they caſt into the fire, they that fled, ſcaped narrowly.

King Henry the eight entreth into Tirwin.

Wedneſday the. xiiij. day of September the king and his army came to Beatwyn, and there had plentie of all things, and on the morow he with his army paſſed forwarde and came to a ſtraite, where was a foorde and all the cariages muſt nedes come downe a ſtepe hill to the foord and ſo to the ſtreyt, where as one Wagon ſcarce alone might paſſe, and the weather was hot, and the beaſtes had not dronke all daye: wherfore at the foord the horſes would drinke mauger their leaders, and ſo the cariages went not all whole together which was a doubtfull caſe, but yet by wiſe order they paſſed the ſtrayt, and ſo did the armie, and came to a place betweene Cauon and Cambline, and there lodged that night in a plaine barrein grounde, and the next day he remoued his Campe, and the forewarde paſſed a bridge called Pount Iuandien into Flaunders ſyde, and there lay, the king lay at the other ende of the bridge on Arthoys ſide, and the rereward lay in a fayre ground behinde the king.

Saterday the. xvij. day of September, tidynges came to the king how the Frenchemen had aſſembled a great puyſſaunce, and would fight with the king, wherefore the king cauſed his forward to remoue farther, and ſent the Almaynes to kepe the paſſage. Then the great ordinaunce paſſed the bridge of pount Iuandien, and the king was remoued from thence, and as his tents were taking by,an alerye was made that the enemyes were in sight, which noyse was sodainly ceased, & sir William Sandes with seuen hundred Englishemen and straungers was appoynted to keepe the Bridge, and certaine ordinaunce was to him appoynted.

When the king and all the cariages were passed,then the Lord Harbert remoued ouer the Bridge, and encamped him behinde the king by a fayre Hyll, when the king was encamped and all thinges in order, there came to him a noble man of Flaunders called the Lorde Rauesten, which after hys humble reuerence done, shewed the king that the yong Prince of Castell Charles,and the Ladie Margaret gouernesse of the sayde Prince, most hartily desired him for his pastyme after his long trauaile, to come and repose in his towne of Lisle, and to see his brother the Prince, and the Ladyes of the Court of Burgoin,saiyng that it became not Ladies to visit him in his martiall campe, which to them was terrible. The king gently graunted hys request, and then he sent his officers thether to make prouision, and appoynted the Duke of Buckingham,the Marques Dorset, the Erle of Esser, and the the Lorde Lisle, and dyuers other to geue their attendaunce on him, and committed his campe to his counsaile. Then he mounted on a Courser,hys apparell and barde were cloth of siluer of small quadrant cuttes, trauersed and edged with cut cloth of golde, and the border set full of red Roses,his armure freshe and set full of Jewelles, the Mayster of his horse Sir Henrye Guilforde, and the Henxmen folowed as you haue heard before, and the Coursers richely apparayled, and so were many Capitaines that wayted on the king: by the way met the king,the Lord Rauesten with many noble men, and a myle without the towne, there met with him the Burgesses of Lisle, and presented to him the keyes of the towne,saiyng, that the Emperor their souereigne Lorde had so commaunded them to do. The king praysed their obedience to their souereigne, and thanked the Emperour and them for so high a present as the keyes of such a towne. Neuertheless he had such confidence in them, that he trusted them no lesse then his awne subiectes, and so deliuered the keyes to the Prouost of the towne which was well accompanied: then met the king a great number of Nobles of Flaunders, Brabant, Holland, and Henawde, which nobly receyued him. After them came the Countie Palatine,or Paulsgraue,one of the electours of the Emperor,with xxx. horses, all his men gorgiously apparayled after the fassion of his Countrie,and humbly saluted the king. At the gate of Lisle the Capitaine of the towne stood with a garrison in armure well appointed,all the streetes were set on both sydes with burnyng Torches and diuers goodly Pagiants pleasant to beholde: thus he passed thorowe the towne with his sworde and maces borne before him, and alighted at the hall doore with his sworde borne, where met with him the Emperour, the Prince of Castell, and the Ladye Margaret, and humbly saluted him: Then for reuerence of the Emperour, the king caused his sworde to be put by and his Maces to be layde downe, then was the king and all other Nobles lodged and feasted accordyng to their degrees.

In the towne of Lisle was a noyse that three Gonners with Handgonnes should haue slaine the king: For which rumor many were attached, but nothing proued,but when this tidynges came to the campe, they were neuer

nery till they ſawe the king againe, great was the cheere with Bankettes, Playes, Commodies, Maſkes, and other paſtymes, that was ſhewed to the king in the Court of Burgoyn, and ſo in ſolace he ſoiourned there Sunday, and Munday, the.xix. day of September: the.xx. day he ſent worde that his armie ſhould remoue toward Tournay, and ſo they remoued to a place conuenient betweene Tournay and Liſle, and certaine Capitaynes were appoynted to kepe the paſſage at the Bridge of Iuandien.

After that the king had taryed at Liſle three dayes, and had well reposed himſelfe, he toke his leaue and thanked the Emperour, & the yong Prince and the Ladie Margaret, & al the Ladyes, of al his high cheere and ſolace, & about fiue of the Clock at night, he departed out of Liſle, and the noble men brought the king forth and ſo returned, and then the Capitayne ſhut the Gates.

When the king was a myle and more out of the towne, he aſked where his campe lay: and no man there could tell the way, and guide had they none, the night was darke and miſtie: thus the king taryed a long while and wiſt not whether to go, at laſt they met with a vittayler comming from the campe, which was their guyde and brought them thether. The maiſter of the ordinaunce ſhot diuers pieces of ordinaunce but they were not heard, but in ſafetie the king with all his company returned.

The.xxj. day of September the king remoued his campe toward Tournay, and lodged within three myles of the Citie, on a corne ground by the ryuer. The which night came to the king the Emperour, and the Paulſgraue, which were lodged in riche Tentes, and noblye ſerued of all vyandes and thinges neceſſary. The people about Tournay were with their goodes fled to the Citie, and yet the Citie had no men of warre to defende it, but wyth multitude of Inhabitauntes the Citye was well repleniſhed, the king commaunded Sir Rice and his horſemen to bewe one quarter, and the Erle of Eſſex and his companie another quarter, and the Lorde Walowne and the Lorde Ligny the other quarters: ſo the.xxij. daye of September theſe foure Capitaines at one time were ſeene openly with banners diſplayed before the towne, and there made a long ſtale and returned. The king ſent Gartier king of armes, and a Purſiuant of armes wyth a Trumpet to ſommon the City, which declared that the king of England and of Fraunce commaunded them to yeeld to him his Citie and to receaue him as their naturall Lorde, or he would put them and their Citie to ſworde, fyre and bloud. To whome they prowdely aunſwered, that they tooke no Citie of him to keepe, nor none would they render, with which aunſwere he departed. Then they fortefied their walles, and made prouiſion for vitaile, corne, wyne, and artilarie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the Citie of it ſelfe was ſtrong, well walled, and turryted with good Bulwarkes and defences: But when they ſawe the king with ſuch a puyſſaunce draw neere their City, they were ſore abaſhed, and called for a generall counſayle: then the Prouoſt ſayde, brethren you knowe how that the king of Englande ſent an Heraulde to ſommon vs to render to him this Citie, or elſe he would put it and vs to the ſworde, fire, and bloud, we aunſwered we would be at defence: nowe he is come in our ſight to fulfill the meſſage ſent by his Heraulde, and nowe is come the time of our defence, and in this matter ſtandeth three miſchiefes, one is our bounden duetie and allegeaunce that we owe to our ſouereigne uereigne Lorde king Loys of Fraunce, the seconde the lyues of vs, oure wyues, children and neighbours, the thirde how to defend the finall destruction of this auncient Citie, which is lykely to fall, which Citie was neuer conquered, and now our Citie is whole (your lyues in saftie, your goodes your awne) determine whether you will haue warre or peace. Then the common people cryed all warre, warre, warre, then sayde the Prouost take compassion of wyues and children and of the olde folke, consider if you haue no quick rescue, you can not continue against ponder puyssaunce, although your courages were as good as Hectors or Achilles, this the wisest of the citie I haue considered. Then sodainely was there in the counsaile a vauntparier, a botcher which hearing this, called a great number of his affinity & went out of the counsayle, and so out of the gates and set fire of the suburbes on all sides. When the counsayle sawe the mindes of the commens and that their wayes might not be folowed, then they comforted the people and maintayned them for their defence. The king rayled his campe and came in array of battayle before Tournay, the Erle of Shrewesburie with the forewarde was a little space on the right hande brest with the kings battayle, and the Lorde Harbert with the rereward on the left hande in lyke maner, the daye was fayre and the harnesse glistered and banners waued, that they of the Citie was sore affrayde: thus stoode the kinges battailes in arraye before Tournay. Then the king commaunded his great ordinaunce to be caryed in the waye passyng towarde the citie, and so euery thing according to his commaundement was accomplished. Then the king himselfe with a fewe persons rode betweene his ordinaunce and the towne, and rode in great aduenture so neere the walles, that he might bewe the walles and the towers berie well: they shot out of there towres peeces of ordinaunce and hurt suche as came wythin their leauell. Then they rong the alarme Bell, which was hearde well in the fielde. Then the Cityzens issued oute at the gate by the ryuer and manfully proffered to skirmishe, but they with archers were sone driuen back to their gates. The Englishe cariers that came with the hacbushers to take ground, ranne to the gates of Tournay, and toke certayne Wagons with beere and vitayle, and yet the Turnoyes durst not resist, although they were in greater number then the men of cariage. In this skirmishe the horse of the Lorde John Gray brother to the Marques Dorset, which went to defende the Cariours was slayne with a Gonne, and he not hurt. After that the king in person had thus in ieopardie auentured himselfe and bewed the towne, he caused immediatly. xxj. peeces of great artillerie to be brought in a plaine field before the towne, and when they were charged, they were immediatly shot, and the most part of the stones fell within the Citie, and so they shot dyuers shots one after another.

Then the King with all hys battayle planted his siege on the Northe part of the Citie: The Erle of Shrewesburie with his battayle warded towarde the southside of the ryuer and there lay that night. The Lorde Harbert with the rereward planted his battayle on the West side of the City, and with great ordinaunce daylie bet the walles and towres of the City. On the morowe beyng the. xxiij. day: the Lorde Talbot Erle of Shrewesburie accompanied with the noble men of his battayle whose names you haue heard at his first passyng the sea, passed ouer the ryuer of Tournay, and planted his his siege on the Southside stretching to the East ende of the Citie, and bent his artillerie against the walles of the Citie. Thus was the Citie of Tournay besieged on all partes, and euer in hope of rescue valyauntly defended her selfe.

Nowe must I leaue the kyng at the siege of Tournay, and diuert to thinges done in England in his absence, and declare how the king of Scots inuaded the realme of England, and how he was defended and fought withall, and in conclusion slayne the seuenth day of this moneth of September.

When the kyng of Englande was determined in his high court of Parliament to passe the sea, in proper person for the recouerie of his realme of Fraunce, he and his counsaile forgate not the olde prankes of the Scottes which is euer to inuade the realme when the king is out of the realme: and also he had knowlege that at Camphere in Zelande the Scottes dayly shipped long speres called Colleyne Clowystes, armour and artillerye, whych dealing made his grace and his counsaile to doubt: notwithstanding that the king of Scottes was sworne on the Sacrament to kepe the peace, yet for boyding all doubtes, the king appoynted the Lorde Thomas Hawarde Erle of Surrey sonne to the Lord John Hawarde Duke of Norffolke and high Treasorer and Marshall of England, to be his Lieutenant in the North partes against the sayd king of Scottes, if he fortuned to inuade (as he did in dede) according to the olde Traytorous accustome of his Progenitors, and that the sayde Erle should rayse the powers of the countrie of Chesshire, Lancasshire, Northumberland, Westmerland, & Comberland, besides other ayd, to be appointed by the Queene. And when the king should take shipping at Douer he tooke the Erle by the hande, and saide, my Lorde I trust not the Scots, therfore I pray you be not negligent, then sayd the Erle I shal so do my duety, that your grace shall finde me diligent, and to fulfill your will shall be my gladnesse. After the departure of the kyng, the Queene returned to London, and the Erle of Surrey attended vpon her, and shortely sent for his Gentelmen and Tenauntes, which were fiue hundred able men, which mustered before Sir Thomas Louell knight, the .xrj. day of July, and the .xrij. day he rode through London northward, and came to Dancaster, and there commaunded Syr William Bulmer knight to make haste to the Marches of Scotlande, and to lye in the Castels and Fortresses on the Frontiers with two hundred Archers on horsebacke: for the Erle by open tokens daylye perceyued that the Scots entended warre. Then the sayd syr William with all spede departed and came to the Borders, and the Erle came to Pomfret, the first day of August, & there taried. After that syr William Bulmer was come to the Borders, one day in August, the Lord Chamberlayne and Warden of Scotlande with seuen or eyght thousand men with banner displayed entered into England, and brent and harped a great praye in Northumberland: that hering, Sir William Bulmer called to hym the Gentelmen of the borders wyth his Archers, and all they were not a thousand men. And when they were nere assembled, they brought themselues into a Brome field, called Wylfield, where ỳ Scots should passe. And as the Scots proudly returned with their pray, the Englishmen brake out, and the Scottes on fote like men them defended, but the Archers shotte so wholy together, that they made the Scottes geue place, and fiue or syx hundred of them were slaine, and foure hundred hundred and more taken Prisoners, & the praye rescued beside a great number of Geldinges that were taken in the countrye, and the Lord Hume, Lord Chamberlayne fled, and his banner taken. This was the first open token of warre, shewed by the Scottes, which called thys iourney the ill Roade.

The Erle of Surrey beyng at Pomfrete, called to him the most part of the Gentelmen of the Coũties to him appoynted as is before rehersed, declaring to them the kinges high commaundement, shewing them, that he beyng there the kinges Lieutenaunt must nedes haue ayde and counsaile: Wherefore he sware the most wisest and expert Gentelmen in such causes of the kinges counsail and his for that time, for the better complishing of his charge and purpose, and for to bring euery thing in due order: First they tooke a determination wyth syr Philip Tilney knyght, Treasurer of the warres, how the charges should be payed, and secondarily with syr Nicholas Appiyard, Maister of the ordinaunce, for the conueyaunce of the kynges royall ordynaunce, pouder, and artillerie to Newcastell, and so forwarde as the case should require, which syr Nicholas by William Blacknall Clerke of the kinges spycerie, sent the sayd ordinaunce and artillerye to Durham before, so that all thinges, concerning that office were in a redinesse. The Erle forgat not to send to all Lordes Spirituall and Temporal, knightes, Gentelmen, or other which had Tenauntes, or were Rulers of Townes or liberties (able to make men) to certefie what number of hable men horsed and harnessed, they were able to make with in an howers warning, and to geue their attendaunce on hym, and also he layed Postes euery way, which Postes stretched to the Marches of Wales to the counsayle there, by reson whereof, he had knowlege what was done in euerye coast.

The Erle was informed by the Lorde Dacers, of the numbring and preparing of men in Scotland, and proclamations sounding to the breche of peace, and yet though he considered that the Road made by the Lord Chamberlaine of Scotland into England, being distrussed by syr William Bulmer as is afore rehersed, was an open breech of the perpetuall peace: yet the sayd Lorde Dacers auised the Erle for many and wayghtie causes, not to raise or styre the powers of the country, to him appointed, till he might perceiue and openly knowe the subtyll purpose and entent of the Scottes afore sayd, lest if the Scottes had perceyued the Englishmen redie to fight, they would haue desisted of their purpose for that time, tyll the Englishmen were returned to their countries, and then sodaynely to rise agayne.

Then the Erle knowing that the towne of Barwick was strong ynough, sent to the Capitaine of Norham, certefiyng him that if he thought the Castell in any daunger or debilitie, he woulde put hymselfe in a redinesse to rescue it, if it were besieged, the Capitaine wrote to the Erle, thanking him and prayed God that the king of Scottes would come with his puyssaunce, for he woulde kepe hym playe tyll the time that the king of Englande came out of Fraunce to rescue it, which answer reioysed the Erle much.

After the kyng of Scottes had sent hys defiaunce to the kyng of Englande, lying before Tyrwyn, as you haue heard, he daylye made hys musters, and assembled hys people ouer all his realme, whereof the brute was that they were two hundred. M. but for a suerty they were an hundred thousand good fighting men at the lest, & wyth all his host and power entered into to Englande (and thzew dowue Pyles) the two and twentie daye of Auguſt, and planted his ſiege before the Caſtel of Nozham, & ſore abated the walles. The Erle hard tidinges thereof the fiue and twentie daye of Auguſt.

Then he wzote to all the Gentelmen of the ſhiers afozeſayd, to be with him at Newcaſtell, the firſt daye of September next with all their retinewe according to the certificat. On the mozrow, he with his fiue hundzed men came to Yozke, and the .xxvj. daye he went towarde Newcaſtell, and notwithſtanding that he had the fowleſt daye and night that coulde be, and the wayes ſo deepe, in ſo much that his guide was almoſt dzowned befoze him, yet he neuer ceaſed, but kept on his iourney to geue example to them that ſhould folow. He being at Durham was aduertiſed how the king of Scots with his great ozdinaunce had raſed the Walles of the Caſtell of Nozham, and had made thzee great aſſaultes thze dayes together, and the Capitayne valiauntly defended him, but he ſpent vainely ſo much of his ozdinaunce, bowes and arrowes, and other munitions that at the laſt he lacked, and ſo was at the ſixt day compelled to yeld him ſimply to ẏ kings mercy. This Caſtell was thought vnpzegnable, if it had bene well furniſhed, but the Scots by the vndiſcrete ſpendyng of the Capitaine, toke it in ſixe dayes: this chaũce was moze ſozowfull to the Erle then to the Biſhop, owner of the ſame. All that night the winde blewe couragiouſly, wherefoze the Erle doubted leaſt, the Lozde Hawarde his ſonne great Admirall of England ſhould periſh that night on the ſea, who pzomiſed to land at Newcaſtell with a thouſand men, to accompanie his father, which pzomiſe he accompliſhed.

The Erle the .xxx. day of Auguſt came to Newcaſtell: thither came the Lozde Dacres, Sir William Bulmer, ſir Marmaduke Conſtable, and many other ſubſtanciall gentlemen, whome he retayned with him as Counſaylozs, and there determined that on Sunday nezt enſuyng, he would take the fielde at Bolton in Glendale, and becauſe manye Souldiours were repayzing to him, he left Newcaſtel to ẏ entent that they that folowed ſhould haue there moze rowme, and came to Alnewicke the thirde day of September, and becauſe hys Souldiours were not come, by reaſon of the foule way he was faine to tarye there all the fourth day beyng Sunday, which day came to him the Lozde Admirall his ſonne, with a companie of valiaunt Capptaynes and able Souldiours and Marinars, which all came from the Sea, the commyng of him much reioyced his father, foz he was very wyſe, hardy, and of great credence and erperience. Then the Erle and his Counſail with great deliberation appoynted his battayles in ozder with winges and wyth Ryders neceſſary.

The ozder of the battails made by the Erle of Surrey in the abſence of king Henrie againſt Iames king of Scotters.

Firſt, of the fozewarde was Capitaine the Lozde Hayward, Admirall of England, with ſuch as came from the ſea, and with him Sir Nicholas Appleyarde, ſir Stephen Bull, ſir Henry Shereburne, ſir William Sidney, ſir Edward Echyngham, the Lozde Cliffozde, the Lozde Conyers, the Lozde Latimer, the Lozde Scrope of Upſaile, the Lozde Egle, the Lozd Lomley, ſir William Bulmer with the power of the Biſhopzike of Durham, ſir William Gaſcoyne, ſir Chriſtopher Warde, ſir John Eueryngham, ſir Thomas Wetham, ſir Water Griffith, and many other.

Of the wing on the right hande of the fozewarde, was Capitaine Sir Edmond Haward knight Marſhall of the hoſte, and with him Bzyan Tunſtall, ſtall, Raufe Brearton, John Laurence, Richard Bolde Eſquiers, and ſyr John Bothe, ſir Thomas Butler knightes, Richard Donne, John Bygod, Thomas Fitzwilliam, John Clarups, Bryan Stapleton, Robert Warcop, Richard Cholmeley, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenauntes of Hatfielde, and other.

Of the wing of the left hande, was Capitaine, ſir Marmaduke Conſtable with his ſonnes, and kinnesmen, ſir William Percy, and of Lancaſhire a thouſand men.

Of the rereward was Capitain the Erle of Surrey himſelfe, and with him the Lorde Scrope of Bolton, ſir Philip Tylney, ſir George Darcy, ſyr Thomas Barkeley, ſir John Rocliffe, ſir Chriſtopher Pikeryng, Richarde Tempeſt, ſir John Stanley with the Biſhop of Elyes ſeruauntes, ſir Brian Stapulton, Lionell Percy, with the Abbot of Whitbyes tenauntes, Chriſtopher Clapham, ſir William Gaſcoine the yonger, ſir Guy Dawney, maiſter Magnus, maiſter Dalbyes ſeruauntes, ſir John Normaule, the Citizens of Yorke, ſir Ninian Markanuile, ſir John Willoughby with other.

On the left hande wing in the rerewarde, was ſir Edwarde Stanley knight, with the reſidue of the power of ỹ County Palantine of Lancaſter.

And when all men were appoynted, and knewe what to do: The Erle and his Counſaile concluded and determined among other thinges, to ſende Rouge Croſſe, Purſuuant of armes with a Trompet to the king of Scots, with certaine inſtructions, and willed him to ſhewe the ſayd king, that where he contrary to his othe and league, and vnnaturally againſt all reaſon and conſcience hath entered and inuaded this his brothers Realme of England, and done great hurt to the ſame, in caſtyng downe Caſtelles, Towers, and houſes, brennyng, ſpoylyng and deſtroyng the ſame, and cruelly murtheryng the king of Englande his brothers ſubiectes. Wherefore he the ſayde Erle will be redie to trie the rightfulneſſe of the matter with the king in battaile by Fryday next commyng at the fartheſt, if he of his noble courage will geue him tariyng, and abode: And the ſame the ſayd Erle promiſeth as he is true knight to God, and the king of England his maiſter. And before Rouge Croſſe ſhould depart with the ſayde inſtructions, the ſayde Lorde Admirall gaue him in credence to ſhew the ſayde king of his commyng, and part of his companie on the ſea with him: and that he had ſought the Scottiſhe naupe then beyng on the ſea, but he coulde not meete with them, becauſe they were fled into Fraunce, by the coaſt of Irelande. And in aſmuch as the ſayde king had dyuers and manye times cauſed the ſayde Lorde, to bee called at dayes of truce, to make redreſſe for Andrewe Barton, a Pyrate of the Sea, long before that vanquiſhed by the ſame Lorde Admirall, hee was nowe come in his awne proper perſon to be in the Vauntgarde of the field, to iuſtifie the death of the ſayde Andrewe, againſt him and all his people, and woulde ſee what coulde be layde to his charge the ſayde day, and that he nor none of his company ſhould take no Scottiſh noble man priſoner, nor any other, but they ſhould die if they came in his daunger, onleſſe it were the kinges awne perſon, for hee ſayde he truſted to none other curteſy at the handes of the Scottes.

And

And in this maner he ſhould finde him in the vauntgard of the fielde, by the grace of God, and Saint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the departyng of Rouge Croſſe with the ſaide inſtructions and credence, it was thought by the Erle and his Counſaile, that the ſayd king would faine and imagine ſome other meſſage, to ſend an Herault of his with the ſame, only to view, and ouerſee the maner and order of the kinges royall army, ordinaunce and artillarie, then beyng with the Erle, whereby might haue enſued great daunger to the ſame, and for the eſchuyng thereof, he had in commaundement, that if any ſuch meſſage were ſent, not to bring any perſon, comming therewith, within three or two mile of the fielde at the ſighteſt, where the ſaid Erle would come, and here what he would ſay: And thus departed Rouge Croſſe with his Trumpet apparayled in his Cote of armes. A good policie.

On Monday the fift day of September, the Erle tooke his field at Bolton in Glendale, as he had appoynted, where all the noble men and Gentlemen met hym with their retinues, to the number of. xxvj. M. men, and about midnight next enſuyng, came the Trompet, which went to Rouge Croſſe, and declared howe the king of Scottes, after the meſſage done to him by Rouge Croſſe accordyng to his inſtructions, the ſayd king detayned him, and ſent one Ilay a Herault of his with him vnto the Erle, to declare to hym the ſayde kinges pleaſure, to whome the Erle ſent Yorke Herault at armes, to accompany the ſayde Ilay, at a Village called Wylo, two myles from the fielde, vntill the commyng thether of the ſayd Erle the next morow.

The firſt day of September, early in the morning, the Erle accompanied with the moſt part of the Lordes, Knightes and Gentlemen of the field, euery man hauyng with him but one man to holde his horſe, and ſo the ſayde Herauld met with the Erle, and with blunt reuerence declared to him that he was come from his mayſter the king of Scottes which would knowe whether the Erle ſent any ſuch meſſage by Rouge Croſſe, the Erle iuſtifyed the ſame, ſaiyng farther, that Rouge Croſſe had the ſame meſſage of him in writyng ſigned with his awne hande, whereunto the ſayd Ilay ſayde. As to the abidyng for battaile betwene that and Friday, then next folowyng, the king his maiſter bade him ſhewe to the Erle, that he was as welcome as any noble man of England vnto the ſame king, and that if he had bene at home in his towne of Edenbourgh, there receiuyng ſuch a meſſage from the ſayde Erle, he would gladly haue come and fulfilled the ſayde Erles deſyre: And the Herauld aſſured the Erle on the king his maiſters behalfe, that the ſame king would abide him battail at the day prefixed, where of the ſayd Erle was right iopous, and much prayſed the honourable agreement of the ſayd royall king, & eſteemed the ſame to procede of an high and noble courage, promiſyng the Herauld that he and good ſuretie with him, ſhould be bound in ten thouſand pound ſterlyng to kepe the ſayde day appoynted, ſo that the king would find an Erle of his, and thereto a good ſurety with him to be bound in lyke ſumme for the perfourmance of the ſame: And furthermore, the Erle bad the Herauld to ſaye to his Mayſter, that if he for his part kept not his appoyntment, then he was content, that the Scottes ſhould Baffull him, which is a great reproche among the Scottes, and is vſed when a man is openly periured, & then they make of him an Image painted reuerſed, with his heeles vpwarde, with his name, wonderyng, cryng, and blowyng out of him with Baffullyng what it is.

hornes, in the moſt diſpitefull maner they can, in token that he is worthie to be exiled the companie of all good creatures.

Then Ilay deliuered to the Erle a little Cedule, written with the kings ſecretaries hande vnſigned, the tenor whereof foloweth.

¶ As to the cauſes alleged of our comming into Englande, againe our bande and promiſe (as is alleged) thereto we aunſwere, our brother was bounde alſo farre to vs as we to him. And when we ſware laſte before hys Ambaſſade, in preſence of our counſayle, we expreſſed ſpecially in our othe, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not elſe, we ſweare our brother brake firſt to vs, & ſithe his breke, we haue requyred dyuers times him to amend, and lately we warned our brother as he did not vs, or he brake, & this we take for our quarell, and with Gods grace ſhall defende the ſame at your aſſired time, which with Gods grace we ſhall abide.

And for as much as the king kept ſtill Rouge Croſſe with him, who was not yet returned, the ſame Erle cauſed the ſayde Ilay to be in the keping of Sir Humfrey Lyſle and Yorke Heraulde, in the ſame Village, vntill the time that a ſeruaunt of the ſayde Ilay might ryde in all haſte to the king of Scottes, for the deliuering of the ſayde Rouge Croſſe. Then the Erle ioyous of the kinges aunſwere, returned to his Campe, and ſet forwarde fiue mile, to a place called Moller Hawgh, in ſuch order of battayle, as euen then he ſhould haue fought, and there lodged for that night, three little miles from the king of Scottes, and betweene the king and him was a goodly and large corne field, called Wylfelde, which was a conuenient and fayre ground for two hoſtes to fight on, there euery hoſte might perceyue other.

The morowe beyng Wednſday, the. vij. day of that Month, the king of Scots cauſed his great ordinance to be ſhot at the Engliſh army, but it hurt neither man nor beaſt. When the king of Scots ſaw ꝑ Ilay was detayned, he ſent away Rouge Croſſe to the Erle, by whom, and other of the borderers he was aduertiſed ꝑ the king lay vpon the ſide of a high mountaine, called Flodon on the edge of Cheuyot, where was but one narow field for any man to aſſend vp the ſayd hill to him, & at the fote of the hill lay all his ordinance. On the one ſide of his armie was a great Marriſh, and compaſſed with the hils of Cheuyot, ſo that he lay to ſtrong to be approched of any ſide: except the Engliſhe men would haue deſperatly runne on his ordinaunce, which matter well conſidered by the Erle and his ſonne, and other of the counſaile there they called to them Rouge Croſſe, and ſent him the next daye to the king of Scottes, wylling him to ſhewe the king, that the ſayde Erle, with dyuers of the kings nobles and ſubiectes had auaunced themſelues to geue battaile to his grace, truſting that according to his promiſe, he would auaunce himſelfe and his armie to ioyne the battayle, which as yet he hath not done. Wherefore he deſired the king that he might haue knowlege by noone that daye, whether he of hys noble courage would diſcend the hill where he laye, and to geue battayle or not: and if he ſay that I ſhall not knowe his intent, or wyll, ſay that he wyll kepe the ground: then ſhewe him that he perceyueth well that that place is no indifferent grounde for two armies to fight, and therefore I will looke for no more of his delayes. The ſame day beyng our Ladie daye the Natiuitie, Rouge Croſſe departed to the king of Scottes, which would not heare him ſpeake, but ſent one of his ſeruitours to heare his meſſage.

meſſage. Which ſeruitour after he had diſcloſed the ſame to the king, made aunſwere, that it beſeemed not an Erle, after that maner to handle a king, and that he would vſe no ſozcerie, noz had no truſt of any ground.

You haue heard befoze how Jlay the Scottiſh Herauld was returned foz Rouge Croſſe, and aſſone as Rouge Croſſe was returned, he was diſcharged, but he taryed with Yozke an Engliſh Herauld making good chere, and was not returned that mozning that Rouge Croſſe came on his meſſage, wherefoze Rouge Croſſe and his Trompet were detayned by the ſeruaunt of Jlay, which the day befoze went foz Rouge Croſſe, aſſuryng them that if Jlay came not home befoze noone, that he was not lyuing, and then they ſhould haue their heades ſtriken off, then Rouge Croſſe offered that his ſeruaunt ſhould go foz Jlay, but it would not be accepted, but as hap was Jlay came home befoze noone, and ſhewed of his gentle entertaunment, and then Rouge Croſſe was deliuered, and came to the Engliſhe armie, and made repozt as you haue heard.

Then the Engliſhe men remooued their field on the water of Tyll, and ſo foozth ouer many hilles and ſtreytes, marching towarde the Scottes on another ſide, and in their ſight the Scottes burned certayne pooze Villages on the other ſide of the Marſhe.

The Engliſhe men alwayes leauing the Scottiſhe armie on the left hande, tooke their field vnder a wood ſide, called Barmer wood, two myle from the Scottes, and betweene the two armies was the ryuer of Tyll, and there was a little hill that ſaued the Engliſhe men from the Gonneſhot, on which hill the Lozde Admirall perfitely ſawe and diſcouered them all.

In the euening of the ſame day it was concluded betweene the Erle and hys counſayle, and moſt parte of the armie thereto agreed, that the Vauntgard with the ozdynaunce ſhould paſſe ouer agayne to the water of Tyll, at a bzidge called Twyſell bzidge the. ix. day of September, and the rereward to paſſe ouer at Wyltozd, putting themſelues as nigh as they could betweene the Scottes and Scotlande, and ſo to geue battayle to the Scottes on the hyll, called Floddon hyll. Friday the ſayde ninth day, the Lozde Admirall, lyke a valyaunt knight paſſed ouer Twyſell bzidge wyth the Vantgarde, marchyng towarde his enimies, lyke diligence was made by the Erle foz paſſyng ouer at Wyltozd with the rereward, ſayyng to his Capitaines, new good felowes, doe lyke Engliſhe men this daye, take my part lyke men, which part is the kings part, and I wiſte you would not, I will in my awne perſon fight with the king of Scottes, rather to die honozably by his cruelty, then to lyue in ſhame, oz that any repzoch ſhould be layd to me hereafter. To whome they aunſwered, that they would ſerue the king and him truely that day. The Engliſhe armie that day had no vitayle and were faſting, and two dayes afoze they had onely dzonke water, and could ſcarce get any other ſuſtenaunce foz money, and yet they kept array on hozſeback from fiue of the clock in the mozning, till foure of the clock at after noone, and were alwayes in the ſight of the Scottes. Floddon field.

The king of Scottes perceyuing the Engliſhmen, marching toward Scotland, thought that they would haue entered into Scotland, and burne and fozray the plentifull countrey called the Marche, foz ſo was he made beleue by an Engliſhman named Gyles Myſgraue which was familiar with the king of Scottes, and did it for a pollecie to cause him to come downe from the hill: Wherfore the sayd king caused his Tentes to be remoued to an other hyll in great hast least the Englishmen should haue taken the same hyll: And at their departing they set fyer on their litter & other fylthy ordure according to their costome, and of the fyer and smolther did rise such a smoke so thick and so darke, that ỹ one host could not perceiue the other, for the wind did driue the smoke betwene the two armyes, the Scottes euer keping the heigth of the hyll on the edge of the Cheuiot, and the Englishmen passed forward styll in the lowe ground, and euer in the couert of the smoke, insomuch that both the hostes were very nere together, wythin the space of a quarter of a myle, before one of them could perceyue another for the smoke. Then, when the Englishmen had passed a litle brooke, called Sandyforde, which is but a mans step ouer, and that the smoke was passed, and the ayre fayre and clere, eche armie might playnely see one another at hand. Then the Lord Admyrall perceyued foure great battayles of the Scottes all on foote with long speres lyke moorish pikes: which Scots furnished them warlike, and bent them to the forward, which was conducted by the Lord Admyrall, which perceyuing that, sent to his father the Erle of Surrey hys Agnus dei that honge at his brest that in all hast he would ioyne battaile, euen with the brunt or brest of the vantgarde: for the forwarde alone was not able to encounter the whole battaile of the Scottes, the Erle perceyuing well the saiyng of his sonne, and seing the Scottes readye to discende the hyll aduaunsed himselfe and hys people forwarde, and brought them egall in grounde with the forewarde on the left hande, euen at the brunt or brest of the same at the foote of the hill called Bramston, the Englishe armie stretched East and West, and their backes North, and the Scottes in the South before them on the foresayd hill called Bramstone. Then out brast the ordinaunce on both sides with fire, flame, and hideous noyse, and the maister Gonner of the Englishe part slew the maister Gonner of Scotlande, and beate all his men from their ordinaunce, so that the Scotishe ordinaunce did no harme to the Englishmen, but the Englishmens artillery shot into the mydst of the kings battaile and slew many personnes, which seing, the king of Scottes and hys noble men, made the more hast to come to ioyning, & so all the foure battailes in manner discended the hyll at once. And after that the shot was done, which they defended with Pauishes, they came to handstrokes, and were encountred seuerally as you shall here.

First on the English side nert the West, was sir Edmond Hayward knight Marchal of the host chiefe Capitain of a wing of the right hand of our vantgarde, and was encountred with the Chamberlayne of Scotlande wyth his battaile of speres on foote, to the number of .x. M. at the least, which fought valyantly, so that they by force caused the litle wing to flye, and the same Syr Edmond thre times felled to the ground, and left alone, sauing his standard berer, & two of his seruants, to whom came John Heron bastard sore hurt, saiyng there was neuer noble mans son so like to be lost as you be this day, for all my hurtes I shall here liue and dye with you, and there the saide Sir Edmond Hayward was in a great daunger and ieoperdy of his life, & hardely escaped, and yet as he was going to the body of the Vantgard he met with Daule Hume, and slew him his owne hande, and so came to the Vantgard.

Secondly,

Secondly, Eastward from the sayde battaile was the Lorde Admyrall with the Vantgarde, with whome encountred the Erles of Crassorde and Mountroos, accompanied with many Lordes and knightes and Gentelmen all with speres on foote, but the Lorde Admyrall and his company acquyted themselues so well, and that with pure fighting, that they brought to ground a great number, and both the Erles slaine.

Thirdly, Eastward from the Lord Admyrall was the Erle of Surrey, Capitayne generall, to whose standard the kyng of Scottes in his owne person marched, being accompanied with many Bishoppes, Erles, Barons, knightes and Gentelmen of the realme, with a great number of Commons, all chosen men with speres on foote, which were the most assuredly harnessed that hath bene sene, and that the tallest and goodliest personages withal, and he aboad the most daungerous shot of arrowes, which sore them noyed, and yet except it hit them in some bare place it did them no hurt. After the shotte ended, the battaile was cruell, none spared other, & the king himselfe fought valiauntly. O what a noble and triumphant courage was this for a king to fight in a battail as a meane souldier: but what auayled his strong harnesse, the puysaunce of his mightie Champions with whome he discended the hyll, in whome he so much trusted that with his strong people and great number of men, he was able as he thought to haue vanquished that daye the greatest Prince of the world, if he had bene there as the Erle of Surrey was, or else he thought to do such an high enterprice himselfe in his person, that he should surmount the enterprises of all other Princes: but howsoeuer it happened God gaue the stroke, and he was no more regarded then a poore Souldiour, for all went one way. So that of his awne battayle none escaped, but Sir Wylliam Scot knight his Chauncelour, and syr John Forman knight, his Sergeaunt Porter, which were taken prisoners, and with great difficultie saued. This may be a great mirror to all Princes, how that they aduenture themselues to such a battayle.

The king of of Scottes slaine, and all his Nobles taken or slaine.

Fourthly, Eastward was syr Edward Stanley knight, Capitayne of the left wyng with the sayde Erle, which clame vp to the top of the hyll called Bramston, or the Scottes wiste, and with him encountered the Erles of Huntley, Lennour and Arguile, with a great number of Scottes, which were sore fought withall, which perceyuing the Erle of Huntly toke a horse and saued himselfe, if he had tarted he had bene lykely to haue gone with his companie: such as fled, the sayde Sir Edward and his people folowed them ouer the same ground, where the Erles battayle first ioyned, & found there the Scottes, which were by the Erles battayle slayne before, and sodainely left the chase and fell a spoyling, and spoyled the king of Scottes, and many that were slayne in his battaile, but they knewe him not, and found a crosse and certayne things of his, by reason whereof some sayde that he was slayne by that wyng, which could not be true, for the prisoners of Scotland testified that the kinges battayle fought onely with the Erles battayles, but for a truthe this wyng did verye valyauntly: wherefore it was thought that the sayde syr Edward might that day not haue bene missed.

All these foure battayles in maner fought at one time, and were determined in effect, little in distance of the beginning and ending of anye of them one before the other, saupng that syr Edward Stanley, which was the last that fought, for he came vp to the top of the hill, and there fought with the Scottes valiauntly, and chased them downe the hill ouer that place, where the kings battayle ioyned. Beside these foure battayles of the Scottes were two other battayls, which neuer came to hand strokes.

that

The victorie at Flodden field against the Scots.

Thus through the power of God on Fridaye, beyng the. ix. daye of September, in the yere of our Lorde. 1513. was James the fourth king of Scottes slayne at Bramstone (chiefely by the power of the Erle of Surrey, Lieutenaunt for king Henry the eyght, king of England, which then lay at the siege before Tournay) and with the sayde king were slayne.

Mack, Clene, and many other Gentlemen, which be vnknowne, because no officer of armes of Scotlande would come to make serch for them: and if the day had bene longer by three houres, (for it was foure of the clock at after noone or the battayles ioyned) or that the English men had had vitayles so that they might haue bidden still together, they had not alonely made the greatest distresse of Scots by death and taking, that the lyke hath not beene sene in one daye: but also within a little while might haue put the realme of Scotlande in such a miserie & trouble, that for euer they shoulde haue bene ware howe to enter the realme of Englande, and specially the king being absent: for the Englishe men wanted no good will, for of the Scottes they slue twelue thousand at the least of the best gentlemen and flower of Scotlande, and of the Englishe syde were slayne and taken not fiftene hundred men, as it appered by the booke of wages when the souldiours were payde. Thus the Erle of Surrey accomplished ſhed his promiſe at his daye prefixed with the king of Scottes, to hys great fame and honor.

After that the field was fought and the Scottes fled, many Engliſhe men folowed them into Scotland, & were ſo farre that they wiſt not which way to returne, and ſo were taken priſoners of the Scottes that were in the two battailes that fled firſt and neuer fought. Alſo diuers were taken by the Lorde Chamberlayne of Scotlande, which fought with the wyng of ſir Edmond Hayward, and were caried with him to the number of three ſcore. Of the Scottes that fled, ſome paſſed ouer the water of Twede at Caudeſtreme foorde, and other by the dyle marches, during the time of the fight, and the night after, many men loſt their horſes, and ſuch ſtuffe as they lett in their tents and pauilions by the robbers of Tyndale and Tynidale.

The Lorde Dacre with his companie ſtoode ſtill all day vnfoughten withall. When the field was done and the ſcoute watch brought worde that there was no more appearaunce of the Scottes, but all were returned. The Erle thanked God with humble hart, and called to him certayne Lords and other Gentlemen and them made knights, as ſyr Edmond Hayward his ſonne, and the Lorde Scrope, ſyr Wylliam Percy and many other. Then the Erle and the Lorde Admirall departed to Barmer wood, and appointed ſyr Phylip Tylney knight with the companie of the Lorde Admirall and the companie of the Lorde Scrope of Bolton, the Lorde Latimer, olde ſyr Marmaduke Conſtable, ſyr Wylliam Percy, Sir Nycholas Appyard, and their companies, and a fewe other to keepe the place where the field was, for ſauyng of the Engliſhe ordynaunce, and the ordinaunce that was taken from the Scottes, which was fiue great Curtalles, two great Culuerings, foure Sacres, and ſixe Serpentynes, as fayre ordinance as hath bene ſene, beſide other ſmall peeces. Well knowne it was by them that fought, and alſo reported by the priſoners of Scotlande, that their king was taken or ſlayne, but his body was not founde till the next daye, becauſe all the meane people as well Scottes as Engliſhe were ſtripped out of their apparell as they laye on the field, yet at the laſt he was found by the Lorde Dacres, who knew him well by his priuie tokens, in that ſame place where the battaile of the Erle of Surrey and his firſt ioyned together.

This king had diuers deadly woundes, and in eſpeciall one with an arowe, and another with a Bill as appered when he was naked. After that the bodie of the king of Scottes was founde and brought to Barwicke, the Erle ſhewed it to ſyr Wylliam Scot hys Chaunceller, and ſyr John Forman his Sergeant Porter, which knewe him at the firſt ſight, and made great lamentation. Then was the body bowelled, embawmed and ſered, and ſecretly amongſt other ſtuffe conueyed to Newcaſtell. But the ſame day the Lorde Admirall came to the field, and there ſome Scottes appeered on an hill: but Wylliam Blackenall which was the chiefe doer and ruler of all the ordinaunce ſhot ſuch a peale, that the Scottes fled, or elſe the Lorde Admyrall had bene in great ieopardie: and then all the ordynaunce was brought in ſafetie to the Caſtell of Cyrell, and there remayned for a time. After thys noble victorie the Erle wrote firſt to the Queene (which had rayſed a great power to reſiſt the ſayde king of Scottes) of the wynnyng of the battayle, for then the body of the king of Scottes was not founde, and ſhe yet beyng

at the towne of Buckyngham, had worde the next daye after that the king of Scottes was slayne, and a part of his coate armure to her sent, for which victorie she thanked God, and so the Erle after that the North part was set in a quietnesse, returned to the Queene with the dead body of the Scottishe king, and brought it to Richemond.

Now let vs retourne to the king of Englande lying before Tournay which the. xvb. daye of September receyued the Gauntelet and letters of the Erle of Surrey, and knew all the dealing of both parties. Then he thanked God and highly praysed the Erle and the Lorde Admirall and his sonne, and all the Gentelmen and commons that were at that valiaunt enterprize: Howbeit, the king had a secret letter that the Chesshire men fled from sir Edmond Hayward, which letter caused great hart burning and many words, but the king thankfully accepted al thing, and would no man to be displayed. So on the Mundaye at night the six and twentie daye of September, the Lorde Harbert and the Erle of Shrewesburie made great fiers in their armies in token of victory & triumph: and on Tuesday the. xvij. day, the Tent of cloth of Golde was set vp, and the kings Chapel sang masse, & after that Te Deum, and then the Bishop of Rochester made a Sermond and shewed the death of the king of Scots and much lamented the yll death and periurie of him.

The king of England lying thus before Tournay, caused his great ordinaunce to be planted rounde about the Citie, and diuers trenches were caste and rampyers made, and the Lorde Lysle, and the Lorde Wyloughby were appoynted to maintaine the ordinaunce, with their bendes, and the Erle of Kent was lodged before the Gate called port Valencien, so that the Citizens could not issue out, nor no ayde could come in. The ordinaunce dayly bet the gates, towers, and Walles, which made a great batterie: and a fewe Englishemen assaulted the port coquerell, but they were to fewe in number, and if they had bene mo in number, they had taken the towne as the Tournasyns confessed after. The Citizens of Tournay considering their estate, came together to counsaile, and there the Prouost sayd, friendes and brethren of this noble Citie, I can not to much prayse your truth and fidelitie to your soueraigne Lorde the king of Fraunce, considering howe manfully you haue defended this Citie sith the beginnyng of this siege, but alas, although it bee written on the Gates grauen in stone, Iammes ton ne a perdeu ton pucellage, that is to say, thou hast neuer lost thy maydenhed: yet if this Citie had not beene well furnished, and euer at the day appoynted sure of rescue, it could not haue continued: now you see that rescue faileth, our Gates be rased, our Towers beaten downe, our chiefe Tower lyke to fall, so that if this perillous siege continue, or else if our enemies assault vs, we be not able to defend vs: wherfore nowe, all these thinges considered, I would knowe whether you wyll treate with the king of England or abyde the chaunce. Then they which at the last counsaile cryed warre, warre, nowe cryed peace peace, yet all were not agreed: Then one wise man sayde, Sirs if the towne be assaulted once againe with a great number, surely it will be taken: you sawe the experience at the last assault, and then consider if it be taken by force who is there that can say he is sure of his lyfe: but by entreatie, the king of England is so mercifull, that he may fortune to saue both life and goodes. Then finally all agreed to treate. Then the Prouost sent to the king a Trompet, desiryng safe conduyte conduyte for him, and certaine other to come & to speake with him, which request was to him graunted. Then the Prouost of the City accompanied with a.xj. with him of the best of ỳ City, came to the army and spake with the lords of the counsaile, and after they were brought to the kings presence, the Prouost kneeled downe and all his companie, and sayde: Right high and mighty Prince, although the Citie of Tournay is strong, well walled, well replenished with people, vittayles, artillary, yea and the people in feare and dreade of nothing, yet we knowe that against your great puyssaunce it can not continue long, although it were ten tymes as strong as it is, wherfore we knowyng by report your honour, your wisedome, your iustice, and noble heart, are content to become your subiectes and vassals, so that we may haue and enioy our olde lawes, customes, liberties, and franchises, vnder you as we haue before this done vnder other Princes. Then the king aunswered, we haue well heard your peticion, we will common with our Counsaile, and make you aunswere: and when he had commoned with his counsaile, he aunswered saiyng: Sirs, he that asketh mercie of vs shall not be denyed, seyng you come to treate, we remit you to our Counsail. Then they went into the Tent of counsaile, and there the Tournasyns fell at a poynt, and in conclusion, they yelded the Citie, and ten thousand pound sterlyng for the redemption of their libertyes, and so departed to the Citie, making relation of the king and hys noble courage. On Thursday the .xxix. day of September, the king was in his riche Tent of cloth of Golde vnder his cloth of estate, to whome came the Citizens of the Citie, & were swozne to him & became his subiects. Then the king appoynted the Lord Lisle, the Lord Burgayny, the Lord Willoughby to take possession, which with six thousande men entered the Citie, and tooke the Market place and the walles, and serched the houses for feare of treason: and then maister Thomas Wo sey the kinges Almoner called before him all the Citizens yong and old, & sware them to the king of England, the number wherof was foure score M. Thus the king of England by conquest came to the possession of the Citie of Tournay: On Sunday the second day of October, the king entered the Citie of Tournay at Porte Fountaine, and foure of the chiefe of the Citie ouer him bare a Canapie with al the armes of England, euery person was in his best apparell, the Ladyes and Gentlewomen lay in the windowes beholdyng the king and his nobilitie, euery Citizen had in his hand a staffe Torche, the king himselfe was richly apparayled in riche armure on a barded courser: thus the king with his nobilitie all richely apparayled with his swozde bozne before him, his Heraulides and sergeaunts of armes with Trumpettes and Minstralsie entered the Citie, and came to our Lady Church, and there Te deum was song. Then the king called to his presence, Edward Guildford, William Fitzwilliam, John Dauncy, William Tiler, John Sharpe, William Huse, John Sauage, Christopher Garnish, and diuers other valiant Esquiers, & gaue to them the order of knighthood, and then went to his lodging, & at after noone he came to the Market place, where was prepared for him a place: then he caused a Proclamation to be made in his name, king of England & of Fraunce, that no man should griene the Citizens, during which Proclamation ỳ Turnasins scarce loked vp, nor shewed once to him any amiable countenance which was much marked: the crie finished, the king departed to his campe leauing the citie in safe keping.

The Citie of Tournay yelded to the king.

This

This weeke the king rode to see the Castell of Hoxton, and there his grace tooke great pleasure. The king remembring the great cheere that the prince of Castell, and the Ladie Margaret had made him at Lisle, which was but xij. mile English from Tournay, desyred the sayd Prince and Ladie with diuers other to come to him to his Citie of Tournay, and made preparation for the same, and appoynted a iustes whereof he himselfe would be one, and caused a Tilt to be made in the Market place. While these thinges were preparyng, the king and his Counsaile ordered for the sure keepyng of the Citie of Tournay, and there ordeyned sir Edward Bownyngs knight of the order of the Garter, to be his Lieutenant with foure hundred archers, with Capitaines, horsemen, and artillary conuenient, and to haue ayde of Henawde and other the kinges friendes adioyning, and of his garde he left there foure hundred Archers, and ordinance was appoynted for the defence of the same. Monday the.xj. day of October, the king without the towne receyued the Prince of Castell, the Ladie Margaret and diuers other Nobles of theyr Countries, and them brought into Tournay with great triumph. The noise went that the Lorde Lisle made request of mariage to the Ladie Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, a daughter to the Emperor Maximilian, which before that tyme was departed from the king with many riche giftes & money borowed, but whether they proffered mariage or not, she fauored him highly: ther the Prince and Duchesse soiorned with great solace by the space of ten dayes. Duryng which tyme, the.xviij. day of October, began the iustes, the king and the Lorde Lisle aunswered all commers.

The Ladie Margaret receaued and welcommed by king Henry the eyght into Tournay.

A Iustes.

The twenty day of October, the Prince of Castell and the Lady Margaret with manye great gyftes to them giuen retourned to Lyle wyth all their trayne, After that the king was enformed that all directions were taken and put in order for the sure keping of the Citye of Tournay, he tooke the same to sir Edward Bownyngs knight which valiauntly kept it in good order and iustice.

The king and his counsaile before this had considered that the Frenchmen would geue them no battail, and that winter approched, which was no tyme to lie at siege at other townes, concluded to kepe Tournay safely, and to breake vp his campe for that Winter, and to begin againe warre in the spring of the yere: this was a full conclusion taken by the king and his counsaile, and so the king and all his people (except such as were appoynted to be with sir Edward Bownyngs) departed out of Tournay the.xx. day of September: and the king and the noble men made such speede, that shortly they came to Calice, and thether came the Lord Admirall, whom the king hartily thanked of his paynes, and there euery man was payed of his wages and conduyte money, and ships prepared for the passage, and so the.xxiij. day of September the king with a priuy company tooke ship, and the same day landed at Douer, and shortly after all his people folowed, then he with a small companie rode to Richemonde in post to the Queene, where was such a louyng meetyng that euery creature reioyced. This season began a great mortalitie in London and other places, where much people dyed: All this Winter the kinges naule kept the seas, and robbed and spoyled the Frenchemen on their coastes.

The king returneth into England.

A great death or mortalitie in England.

When the king was thus returned he forgat not the good seruice that many many a Gentleman did at the battaile of Bramston, wherefore he wrote to them his louyng letters, with such thankes and fauourable words, that euery man thought himselfe well rewarded. And on the day of the Purification of our Ladie at Lambeth, the king created the Erle of Surrey Duke of Norffolke, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and sir Charles Brandon Vicont Lisle, he created Duke of Suffolke, and the Lorde Haward high Admiral he created Erle of Surrey, & sir Charles Sommerset Lorde Harbert, his chiefe Chamberleyn, he created Erle of Worcester: and after that at another day he made sir Edward Stanley for his good seruice, Lorde Montaygle, and in Marche folowyng was mayster Thomas Wolsey the kinges Almoner consecrate Bishop of Lyncolne, which thereto was named on Newyeres day before: this man was borne at Ipswich, and was a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit, but in pryde, couetousnesse, and ambicion, he excelled all other as you shall heere hereafter.

The discription of Thomas wolsey, which afterwarde was made Cardinall.

In the tyme of king Henry the seuenth, father to king Henry the eight, It was concluded betwene the sayd king, and king Philip of Castell, sonne to Maximilian the Emperour, and king of Castell and his wife, that Charles his eldest sonne shoulde marry the Ladie Mary daughter to the king of England with a dowry to her appointed, at which time they were both yong: Nowe at the kinges returne from Tournay, he made preparation to sende the sayd Ladie his sister to the Prince of Castell. But the Counsaile of Flaūders aunswered, that concernyng her selfe they would gladly receyue to be espoused to their Prince, for she was then one of the fayrest Ladyes of the world: but as concernyng the articles of her dower, they could not fulfyll without the assent of the king of Arragon and the realme of Castell (which as was sayde, minded to haue him maryed in Spaine.) The king like a louing brother would not send his sister wildely without a dower assured, toke the first agreement betwene the king her father, and king Philip his father to be of none effect, sith the Spanyardes would not confirme the same, and the cause was, by reason that king Philip was not naturally borne to be their king, but was king in the right of his wife, and so they were not bounde to his agreements made without their consent. So thus the king of England reteyned still his syster and all the preparation that he had done for her conueyaunce, which was very costly.

This season the Lady Margaret Queene of Scottes late wife to kyng James the fourth slayne at Bramstone, and sister to the kyng, wrote to the king to haue compassion of her and his two Nephewes her sonnes, for she was in feare least he would haue inuaded her realme. The king moued with brotherly compassion, sent her word that if the Scottes kept peace he would kepe peace, if they would haue war he would likewise haue war, & so with that aunswer the messenger departed. In the spring time of the yere the king wrote hys letters to all the noble men and Gentilmen saiyng that he would shortely passe again into Fraunce in his awne person, wherefore euerie man prepared him selfe meete for that iournay: the Flemmynges heryng therof, made purueyaunce for wagons, vittaile, and other thinges which tourned them to great losse for that viage brake of as you shall heere.

All this season Sir Richard Whethill and syr John Tremayle kept so the English Pale that the Frenchmen durst not medle, and yet they spoyled to base Bollen.

Closures made of the common fieldes about London.

Before this time the townes aboute London as Islington, Horston, Shordyche and other, had so enclosed the common fieldes with hedges and diches, that neyther the young men of the Citie might shoote, nor the auncient persons might walke for their pleasure in the fieldes, except eyther their bowes and arrowes were broken or taken away, or the honest and substanciall persons arrested or indited, saiyng that no Londoner should goe oute of the Citie but in the high wayes. This saiyng sore grieued the Londoners and sodainly this yere a great number of the Citie assembled themselues in a morning, and a Turnar in a tooles coate came criyng through the Citye, shouels and spades, and so many people folowed that it was wonder, and within short space all the hedges about the townes were cast downe, and the diches filled, and euery thing made playne, the workemen were so diligent. The kinges counsaile hering of this assemblye came to the Gray Fryars, and sent for the Maior and the counsaile of the City to know the cause, which declared to them the noysaunce done to the Citezens, and their commodities and liberties taken from them, & though they would not, yet the commonalty and yong persons which were damnified by the noysaunce would plucke vp and remedy the same. And when the kinges counsaile had heard the aunswer, they dissimuled the matter, and commaunded the Maior to see that no other thing were attempted, and to call home the Citezens, which when they had done their enterprice, came home before the kings counsayle & the Maior departed without anye more harme doing, and so after the fieldes were neuer hedged.

The king at this season sent againe into Flaunders for the performance of the mariage of the yong Prince of Castell and the fayre Ladye Marie his sister, and shewed how he had prepared all thinges necessarie and conuenyent for such an high estate. The counsayle of Flaunders aunswered that they would not receyue her that yere, with many subtill argumentes, by reason whereof the perfite loue betwene Englande and the lowe countries was much slaked.

The Cap of maintenance.

The nintene daye of May was receyued into London a Cappe of maintenaunce and a sword sent from Pope July, with a great company of nobles and Gentelmen, which was presented to the king on the Sunday then next ensuing with great solemnity in the Cathedrall Church of saint Paul. About thys tyme, the warres yet continuing betweene Englande and Fraunce, Prior John (of whome you haue heard before in the fourth yere) great Capitaine of the French nauy, with his Galeis and Foystes charged with great Basilyskes and other great Artyllerye came on the borders of Sussex and came a lande in the night at a poore village in Sussex called Bright Helmstone, and or the watch could him ascry he set fier on the towne and toke such poore goodes as he found: then the watch fiered the beakons and people began to gather, which seyng, Prior John sowned his Trompet to cal his men aboord, and by that time it was daye: then sir Archers which kept the watch folowed Prior John to the sea, and shot so fast, that they beate the Galimen from the shore, and Prior John himselfe waded to his Foyst, and the Englishmen went into the water after, but they were put backe with pikes or else they had entred ỹ Foyst, but they shot so fast, that they wounded many in the the Foyst and Prior John was shot in the face wyth an Arrowe, and was likelye to haue dyed, and therefore he offered his image of wax before oure Lady at Bolleyn with the English arrowe in the face for a myracle.

When the Lord Admyrall of England had heard these newes he was not content and sent syr John Wallop to the sea incontinent with diuers English ships, which sayled to the coast of Normandy and there landed and brent. xxj. villages and townes with great slaughter of people, and brent shippes and boates in the Hauens of Traport, Stapils & in euerie place. This sir John Wallop quyt himselfe so, that men marueiled of his enterprises, considering he had at the most but eyght hundred men and toke land there so often.

Sir John Wallop a valiaunt Capitaine.

In the moneth of June the Lorde Bowntremy that was Capitaine of Tyrwyn with banner displaied and great ordinaunce, with a great armye came into Picardy nere to Arde. Sir Nicholas Vaux capitaine of Guysnes considering that the Frenchemen had such ordinaunce thought that they woulde haue besieged Guysnes, and wrote thereof to the king which incontinent prouided a great army for the rescue. And when euerie thing was redye and the armie forward, the Lorde Bowntremie raysed his campe and departed wythout any more doing, but for all that the king sent ouer Sir Thomas Louel knight with six hundred men to Calice for the more strength of that Towne and other townes and Castelles beyng within the Englishe Pale and the Marches there.

Richard de la Poole, Traytor to England.

The French king this yere appoynted to Richard de la Pole traytor of Englad & banished the realme. xij. M. Lance knights to kepe Normandy, and also to enter into England & to conquer the same, where they made such a ryotte that many of them were slayne and he was fayne to carye them to Saynt Malos in Britaine to take shippe: for the French men would fayne haue ben rydde of them they cared not how, their condicions were so vile and shamefull, but by the reason that the French kyng syde for the peace this iourney toke none effect.

The French king by an Herauld wrote to the king of England, that he marueled greatly why he made hym so sore warre, and brent and toke hys townes, slew and robbed his people without any cause geuen on his part, wherfore he required the king to graunt safecondite to his Imbassadours, which should entreate the cause: wherevpon in June the French king sent a commission with the President of Roan and certayne other Nobles of Fraunce to entreat peace and allyaunce betwene both the Princes: and farther because they knew that the mariage was broken betweene the Prince of Castell and the Ladye Mary (as you haue heard) they desired the sayde Lady to be espowsed to the French king, affirming a great dower of suerties for the same, with great treasures: so much was offered that the king moued by his counsaile, and especially by the Bishop of Lincolne Wolsey, consented vpon condicion that if the sayde Frenche king Loys dyed, then shee shoulde if it pleased her, retorne into England againe with all her dower and riches: after such entreatie, the Indentures were sealed and the peace proclaymed the seuenth day of August, and the king in presence of the French Imbassadoures swore to kepe the same, and likewise there was sent an Imbassade out of Englande to se the French king swere the same.

The Duchmen hering these newes were sorye, and repented them that they receyued not the Ladye, and spake shamefully of this mariage, that a feble old and pocky man should marry so fayre a Lady, but the voyce of people let not Princes pourposes.

The Ladie Marie sister to king Henry the eight affied to the French king

By the conclusion of this peace was the Duke of Longuyle and other prysoners deliuered, paying their Raunson, and the said Duke affied the Lady Mary in the name of king Lewys his Maister. This Duke was highlye intertayned in England of many noble men and had great chere, but when they came into Fraunce with the Queene he woulde scarce knowe them. Then when all thinges were ready for the conueyaunce of this noble Lady, the king her brother in the moneth of September with the Queene his wife and hys sayd sister and all the court came to Douer and there taried, for the winde was troublous, and the weather fowle, in so much that a ship of the kings called the Libeck of.ix. hundred Tonne was driuen a shore before Sandgate and there brast, and of fyue hundred men scantly escaped thre hundred, and yet the most part of them were hurt with the wreeke. When the weather was fayre then all her wardrobe, stable, and ryches was shypped, and such as were appoynted to geue their attendaunce on her, as the Duke of Norffolke, the Marques Dorset, the Bysshop of Durham, the Erle of Surrey, the Lorde Delawar, the Lorde Barnes, the Lorde Montaigle, the Marques foure brethren, syr Nozice Barkeley, syr John Peche, syr William Sandes, sir Thomas Bulleyn, syr John Carre & many other knights, Squires gentlemen and Ladies, all these went to ship, and the sayde Ladie tooke her leaue of the Queene in the Castel of Douer, and the king brought her to the sea side and kissed her and betooke her to God, and the fortune of the sea, and to the gouernaunce of the French king her husband. Thus the second day of October at the houre of foure of the clock in the morning thys fayre Ladie tooke her ship with all her noble companie: and when they had sayled a quarter of the sea, the winde rose and seuered some of the shippes to Calice, and some into Flaunders, and her ship with great difficultie was brought to Bulleyn, and with great ieopardie at the entring of the hauen for the maister ranne the ship hard on shore, but the boates were ready and receyued this noble Ladie, and at the landing Sir Christopher Garnishe stood in the water, and tooke her in his armes, and so caried her to lande, where the Duke of Uandosme and a Cardinall wyth manye estates receyued her, and her Ladies, and welcommed all the noble men into that Countrie, and so the Queene and all her trayne came to Bulleyn, and there rested, and from thence shee remoued by dyuers lodgings till she came almost within three Myle of Abuyle beside the Forrest of Arders, and there king Loyes vppon a great courser met with her, and shee would haue alighted but he would not suffer her, and welcommed her into his Countrie, and when he had sene her bewtie (which he so long desired) and talked with her a little space, then he returned to Abuile by a secret waye, and shee was with great triumph, procession, and Pagiantes receyued into the towne of Abuyle the eyght day of October by the Dolphyn, which receyued her with great honor, she was apparelled in cloth of siluer, her horse was trapped in Goldsmithes worke verie richely. After her folowed. xxxvj. Ladies, all their Palfreys trapped with crimosyn Ueluet, embrawdered: after them folowed one Charyot of cloth of Tissue, the second cloth of gold, and the third crymo-

ſyn Ueluet embꝛawdered with the kings armes and hers full of Roſes. After them folowed a great number of Archers, and then Wagons laden with their ſtuffe. Great was the ryches in plate, iewels, money, apparell, and hangyngs that this Lady bꝛought into Fraunce. The Monday nert folow-yng, the ſame king Lewys maried the Lady Mary in the great Church of Abuyle, both appareled in Goldſmithes wozke. After the maſſe was done, there was a great banket and feaſt, and the Ladyes of Englande highly enterteyned.

The Tueſday beyng the tenth daye of October all the Engliſhe men except a fewe that were officers wyth the ſayde Queene were diſcharged, which was a great ſoꝛꝛowe foꝛ them, foꝛ ſome had ſerued her long in hope of pꝛeferment, and ſome that had honeſt romes, left them to ſerue her, and nowe they were without ſeruice, which cauſed them to take thought, in ſo muche ſome dyed by the waye returning, and ſome fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the Engliſhe Loꝛdes had done their commiſſion the frenche king wylled them to take no longer payne, and ſo gaue to them good rewardes, and they tooke their leaue of the Queene and returned. Then the Dolphyn of Fraunce called Loꝛde Fraunceys Duke of Ualoys, and by hys wyfe Duke of Bꝛitayne, foꝛ the moꝛe honour of the mariage, beſoꝛe the Engliſhe men departed from Abuyle, cauſed a ſolempne Juſtes to be pꝛoclaymed which ſhoulde be kept at Paris, in the Moneth of Nouember next enſuyng, and that he wyth hys. ir. aydes ſhoulde aunſwere all commers, beyng Gentlemen of name and of armes, firſt to runne fiue courſes at the Tylt with peeces of auantage, and alſo fiue courſes at Randon wyth ſharpe ſpeares, and twelue ſtrokes with ſharpe ſwoꝛdes, and that done, he and his aydes to fight at the barriers with all gentlemen of name and of armes. Firſt ſixe foynes with hande ſpeares, and after that eyght ſtrokes to the moſt auantage if the ſpeare ſo long held, and after that twelue ſtrokes with the ſwoꝛde, & if any man be vnhoꝛſed oꝛ be felled with fighting on foote, then his hoꝛſe & armure to be rendꝛed to the officers of armes, and euery man of this chalenge muſt ſet vp his armes and name vpon an arche triumphant, which ſhall be made at the place where the iuſtes ſhall be, and farther ſhall wꝛite to what poynt he will aunſwere to one oꝛ to all. When this pꝛoclamation was repoꝛted in England by the noble men that returned from the mariage: the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Doꝛſet and hys foure bꝛethꝛen, the Loꝛde Clynton, ſyꝛ Edward Neuell, ſyꝛ Gyles Capell, Thomas Cheney and other ſued to the king to be at the chalenge, which requeſt, he gracioully graunted. Then the Loꝛdes and knightes pꝛepared all thing neceſſarie foꝛ their enterpꝛiſe, and ſhipped their hoꝛſes and harneſſe, and did ſo muche by iournay, that they came to Paꝛys, at the ende of the Moneth of October, which were hartily welcomed of the king and the Dolphyn: but moſt of all, of the French Queene, which then lay at ſaint Denyce, and was not yet cꝛowned noꝛ entred into Paris.

The Dolphyn deſired the Duke of Suffolke and the Loꝛde Marques Doꝛſet, whoſe actiuitie he knew well by repoꝛt, to be two of his immediat aydes, which thereto aſſented. Therefoꝛe was erected an Arche of wydeneſſe at the Tourneis beſide the ſtreete on ſaint Anthony, directly beſoꝛe the Baſtell, on the which were ſet foure Targets oꝛ ſcutchions, the one ſilver and he that set his name vnder that shield, to runne at the Tylt according to the articles: he that put his name vnder the golden Target, should runne with the sharpe speares and fight with sharpe swordes: they that put their names to the black shield, should fight a foote with speares and swordes for the one hande. And he that touched the tawny shield should cast a speare on foote with a Target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand sword: on this arche about stood the armes of the king and the Queene, and beneth them stood the armes of the Dolphyn and his aydes, and vnderneth stood the foure scochions that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of such as set their names to any of the sayde foure scochions. While all these things were preparing, the Lady Mary of England the fift day of Nouember then beyng sunday, was with great solempnity crowned Queene of Fraunce in the monasterie of saint Denice, and the Dolphyn all the season held the crowne ouer her head, because it was of great waight to her greuaunce, at which corronation were the Lordes of England, and according to their degrees well entertayned.

The maner of the receyuyng of the Queene into Paris, and of her coronation.

Monday the sixt day of Nouember, the sayd Queene was receyued into the Citie of Parys after the order that foloweth. First the Garde of the Citie met with her without saint Denice, all in coates of Goldsmithes worke with shippes guilt, and after them met her all the priestes and relygious, which were esteemed to be three thousand. The Queene was in a Chayre couered about (but not ouer her person) in whyte cloth of Golde, the horses that drewe it couered with cloth of Golde, on her head a coronall all of great Pearles, her neck and brest full of Jewels, before her went a Garde of Almaynes after their fashion, and after them all noble men, as the Dolphyn, the Duke of Alanson, the Duke of Burbon, the Duke of Vandosme, the Duke of Longeuyle, and the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, fiue Cardinals and a great number of estates, & about her person rode the kings garde which were Scottes. Thus was this Queene receyued into Paris and so conueyed into the Cathedrall Church and there offered, & from thence to the Palace, and from thence shee went to her lodging for that night, for whome was prouided a great supper, and the Heraulds cryed a larges, and had to them geuen a chip of siluer and guilt, and other Plate to the value of two hundred marke, and after supper began daunsing and pastime. On the morow began the iustes, and the Dolphyn with his aydes entered the field, their apparell and bardes were cloth of golde, cloth of siluer and crymsyn Ueluet kanteled together all in one sute, they shewed themselues before the king and Queene who were in a goodly stage, and the Queene stood so that all men might see her and wondered at her bewtie, and the king was feeble and lay on a couche for weaknesse. Then entred the counter part by a rayle for combring the place. These iustes continued thre dayes, in the which were aunswered three hundred and fiue men of armes, and euery man ranne fiue courses, and with sharpe speares, dyuers were slayne, and not spoken off: the Englishe Lordes and knightes did as well as the best of any the other. At the Randon and Tournay the Duke of Suffolke hurt a Gentleman that he was like to die, the Marques stroke Mounsire Grew an Albanoys with his speare and pierced his head peece and put him in ieopardie: the Duke of Suffolke in the tornay ouerthrewe a man of armes horse and man, and so did did the Lorde Marques another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wise prayse them. At this tornay the Dolphyn was hurt in the hande, so that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his ayde in his rome, the next day after began the fight at the barriers, and because the Dolphyn was not present, the Duke of Suffolke and the Lorde Marques Dorset that day began the field, and toke the barriers with speares in hande abyding all commers. The Dolphyn brought a man secretly, which in al the Court of Fraunce was the tallest and the strongest man, and he was an Almayne, & put him in the place of an other person, to haue had the Duke of Suffolke rebuked. The same great Almayne came to the barres fiercely with face hid, because he would not be knowne, and bare his speare to the Duke of Suffolke with all his strength, and the Duke him receyued, and for all his strength put him by strong strokes from the barriers, and with the but ende of the speare strake the Almaine that he staggared, but for all that the Almayne strake strongly and hardily at the Duke, and the iudges suffred many mo strokes to be foughten then were appointed, but when they sawe the Almayne reele and staggar, then they let fall the rayle betweene them. The Lord Marques Dorset at the same time, euen at the same barre fought with a gentleman of Fraunce that he lost his speare, & in maner withdrewe: When the rayle was let fall, these two noble men put vp their vysers and tooke ayre, and then they tooke swordes with poynt and edges abated, and came to the barriers, and the Almayne fought sore with the Duke, which imagened that he was a person set on for the nonce, but the Duke by pure strength tooke him about the neck, & pomeled him so about the head that the bloud yssued out of his nose, and then they were parted, and the Almayne was conueyed by the Dolphyn least he should be knowne. These two noble men of Englande that day fought valiantly dyuers feates, and the French men likewise nobly them defended, but it happened the Lorde Marques one time to put for his ayde his yongest brother called the Lorde Edward Gray of the age of. xix. yere, and to him was put a gentleman of Fraunce of great stature and strength to the intent to plucke him ouer the barres, but yet the yong Lorde was of such strength, power and pollecie, that he so strake hys aduersarie that he disarmed him, all the face bare. Thus was these enterprises finished to the laude of all parties, and the Englishe men receyued much honor and no spot of rebuke, yet they were priuily set at and in manye ieopardies: for the declaration of this triumph, he that sawe it can tell howe goodly the courssers trotted, bounded and quickly turned: Howe valyauntly the men of armes behaued themselues and howe the Duke of Bourbones bende was appareled and bassed in tawny Uelnet, and cloth of siluer clowdye, the bende of the Erle of Saint Polle appareled and barded in purple Uelnet all to cut on purple Satten, the infaunt of Arragon, sonne to Fredericke last king of Naples, and his bend all in cloth of Golde and siluer paled. This Lord was but yong but was very toward. The Duke of Uandosme & his bend in cloth of Golde, and plunket Uelnet. The Dolphyn and hys aydes were euery day newe appareled at his coste, one day in siluer and Golde, another in Crimesyn Uelnet and yelowe Uelnet, and another daye in white Uelnet and greene, some daye myxed with Satten, some daye embrawdered, some daye pounced with Gold, and so euerye day in chaunge as the workers

fantaſie could deuiſe, but the Engliſhmen had euer on their apparell red troſſes to be knowne for loue of their countrye: at thys triumph the Countye Galeas came into the place on a Jenet trapped in blew Satten and he hym ſelfe lykewiſe appareled and ranne a courſe with a ſpeare, which was at the hed fiue inches on euery ſide ſquare, that is twenty inches about, and at the but nine inches ſquare, that is fiue and thirtie inches, this ſpere was maſſy tymber and yet for all that he ranne cleane along courſe and ſlightly auoyded it to his great honour.

Alſo there was another Gentleman called Anthony Bownarme which came into the fielde all armed, and on his bodie brought in ſight ten ſpeares, that is to wit, three ſperes ſet in euery ſtirroppe forwarde, and vnder euery thigh two ſperes vpward, and vnder his left arme was one ſpere backward, and the tenth in his hande, and when he came before the Queene he let hys horſe ronne, and neuer ſtopped till he had taken euery ſpere after other and broken it on the ground, and he neuer ſtopped his horſe till all were broken, this Gentleman was highly prayſed, and ſo he was worthie: when all this great tryumph was done, the Lordes of England tooke their leaue and were highly thanked of the king, Queene, Dolphyn, and all the Lordes, and ſo departed & came into England before Chriſtmaſſe. In Nouember the Queene was deliuered of a Prince which liued not long after.

Richard Hun cõmitted to the Lollers Tower and murdered.

This yere in December there was one Richard Hun, a marchant Taylor of London in Lollers Tower, by the commaundement of the Biſhop of London, called Richard Fitziames, and Doctor Horſey his Chauncelor. And ſhortly after, the ſayd Hun was found dead hanging by the necke in a girdle of ſilke, within the ſayde Tower: Of this ſtory ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monuments of the Church.

A Parliamẽt

This yere and the fourth day of October, the king began his high court of Parliament, and ſir Thomas Neuell was then ſpeaker, in this Parliament was diuers actes made, but in eſpeciall two, which were much ſpoken of, the one was the act of apparell, and the other the act of labourers, of theſe two actes was much commoning and much buſineſſe aroſe, for the labourers would in no wiſe labour by the day, but all by taſke and in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the Court, and in eſpeciall in harueſt tyme, for then huſband men could ſcaſe get workemen to helpe in their Harueſt. This Parliament continued till Eaſter, in the which diuers ſubſidies were graunted to the king toward his great coſtes and charges, that he had bene at in his voyage royall in Fraunce. This yere dyed at Rome by poyſon, as was reported the Archebiſhop of Yorke and Cardinall, called Doctor Benbricke, which was the kinges Ambaſſador there: this was a wiſe man, and of a holy courage. The king then gaue the ſayd Archebiſhoprike to Thomas Wolſey, then Biſhop of Lincolne, which at that tyme bare all the rule about the king, and what he ſayd was obeyed in all places. And when he was once Archebiſhop, he ſtudied day and night how to be a Cardinall, and cauſed the king and the French king to write to Rome for him, and at their requeſtes he obtayned his purpoſe as you ſhall here afterward.

At this tyme was much commoning, and verily as it appered it was entended, that the king in perſon would paſſe the ſea to Calice, and there on the marches of the ſame, the French king & Queene to come and ſee the king their brother, and for the same iourney many costly workes were wrought, and much riche apparell prouided for, and much preparation made agaynst the nert spring: but death, which is the last ende of all thinges let this iournay, for before the next spring, the French king dyed at the Citie of Paris, the first day of January, when he had bene maryed. lxxvij. dayes. And when the king was aduertised of the death of the French king, he caused a solemne obsequie to be song for him in the cathedrall Church of Saint Paule with a costly herse, and many noble men beyng present.

The death of Lewys the french king.

And after he sent a letter to comfort the Queene his sister, requiryng to knowe her pleasure whether she would continue still in Fraunce or returne into England againe. And when he was aduertised of her purpose, which was to returne into England. He sent the Duke of Suffolke, sir Rycharde wingfield, and Doctor West, with a goodly band of yomen, all in blacke to Parys, which were well receyued of the newe Frenche king Fraunces the first of that name, and declared to him, that accordyng to the couenauntes made at the tyme of the mariage betwene king Loyes and the Lady Mary, sister to the king of England, they demaunded to haue the sayde Queene deliuered to them with her dower, and shewed their commission for the receypte of her: the Counsayle of Fraunce accordyng to the appoyntment assigned to her a dower, and the Duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then shee was by endenture deliuered to the Duke, which behaued himselfe so to her, that he obteyned her good will to be her husband, and thereupon he wrote to the king her brother, meekely beseechyng him of pardon of his request, and humbly requiring him of his wil and consent, at which thing the king a while stayed, and at the last by the meane of the Frenche Queene her selfe, and other great friendes on the Dukes part: After long suyte it was agreed that the Duke of Suffolke should bring her into England vnmaryed, and at his returne to marry her in England: but for doubt of chaūge he maryed her secretly in Parys as it was sayde.

Fraunces the first of that name french king.

The Duke of Suffolke marieth the Ladie Marie ỹ French Queene and sister vnto kyng Henry the eyght.

After that the Duke of Suffolke had receyued the French Queene with her dower appoynted, and all her apparell, iewels, and housholde stuffe deliuered, he with the Queene tooke their leaue of the Frenche king, leauyng Doctor West, nominate Bishop of Ely, for the conclusion of the newe league to be made betwene the king of England, and the newe Frenche king called Fraunces the first, and so passed through Fraunce to Calice, where she was honourably enterteyned. And after with great honour maryed to Lorde Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolke openly: howbeit, some sayd he was maryed priuily before at Parys, in the house of Cluigny. Agaynst this mariage many men grudged, and sayde it was a great losse to the realme that she was not maried to the Prince of Castell: but the wisest sort was content, consideryng that if she had bene maryed againe out of the realme she shoulde haue caryed much rychesse with her, and nowe she brought euery yere into the realme. ix. or x. thousand markes: but whatsoeuer the rude people sayd, the Duke behaued himselfe so, that he had both the fauour of the king and of the people, his wit and demeanor was such.

This Sommer the king tooke his progresse Westward, and visited his townes and Castel'es there, and heard the complaintes of his poore commonaltie, and euer as he roade he hunted and liberally departed with venyson: and and in the middeſt of September he came to his Manor of Okyng, and thether came to him the Archebiſhop of Yorke, whome he hartily welcommed, and ſhewed him great pleaſures: And while he ſoiourned there, a letter was brought to the Archebiſhop from Rome, certifiyng him howe he was elected to be a Cardinall, which incontinent ſhewed the ſame to the king, diſablyng himſelfe in wordes, though his entent was otherwyſe, and ſo the kyng did encourage him, and willed him to take the order on him, and ſo called him my Lord Cardinall, but his Hat, Bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come.

A parliament

In the Moneth of Nouember, the king aſſembled hys highe Court of Parliament at Weſtminſter, and diuers actes made in the Parliament the firſt yere amended and altered, and eſpecially the act of apparell, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of ſtatutes more plainly appereth.

Statute of labourers.

Statute of array.

And at the ende of this Parliament, the Archebiſhoppe of Cauntorburye perceiuyng that the Archebiſhoppe of Yorke medled more in his office of Chaunceloriſhip then it became him to ſuffer, except he would aduenture the kinges diſpleaſure, and ſeyng alſo that the ſayde Biſhop of Yorke coueted to beare all the rule, and to haue all the whole authoritie, conſideryng alſo his awne great age, gaue vp into the kinges handes his rowme of Chauncelor, and deliuered to the king the great Seale, which deliuered the ſame to the Archebiſhop of Yorke, and made him Chauncelor. And aſſoone as he was Chauncelor, he directed commiſſions into all Shires, for to put the ſtatute of apparell and the ſtatute of laborers in execution. And he himſelfe one day called a Gentleman named Simon Fitzrichard, and tooke from him an olde Jacket of Crymoſyn Ueluet, and diuers brooches, which extreeme doyng cauſed him greatly to be hated, and by his example many cruell officers for malice, euill intreated diuers of the kinges ſubiectes, inſomuche that one Shinnyng Maior of Rocheſter, ſet a yong man on the Pillory for wearyng of a riuen ſhirt.

The Cardinalles Hatte receyued.

In the ende of this moneth was ſent into England the Cardinals Hat, and receyued by Gentlemen of Kent, and brought to London with ſuch tryumph, as though the greateſt Prince of Chriſtendome had bene come into the realme. And on a Sonday at Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, he receyued the Habite, Hat, and Piller, and other vaine glorious tryfles, appertaynyng to the order of a Cardinall. And when he was once a perfite Cardinall, hee looked then aboue all eſtates, ſo that all men almoſt hated him, and diſdayned hym.

Then after the Parliament ſir Edward Powynynges laboured to bee diſcharged of the keepyng of the Citie of Tournay, for there he was euer ſickly, and ſo he was diſcharged, and ſir William Blunt Lorde Mountioy was ſent thether. And for Marſhall there was appoynted ſir Sampſon Norton. And when the Lorde Mountioy was come thether, and ſyr Sampſon Norton, there happened ſuch a ryot that the Citie was in great ieopardie, the very cauſe was vnknowen, but all the Souldiours, except ſuch as were of the kinges garde rebelled, and put the Lord Mountioy in ieopardie of his life. And in concluſion to appeaſe the people, ſir Sampſon Norton was baniſhed the towne for euer. And after the Citie was appeaſed, and euery thing thought to be forgotten, diuers were executed, & diuers baniſhed the towne and ſome fled and were baniſhed both England and the towne.

This

This yere was the newe league betweene the king and the French king openly proclaymed thorough the Citie of London with a Trompet. Thys yere also, Margaret Queene of Scottes, wife to James the fourth, slaine at Bramston the fift yere of the king, and elder sister to the king, after the death of her late husband married Archibald Douglas Erle of Angus, without the king her brothers assent, or the Counsaile of Scotland, for the which he was not well pleased. But after that, there fell such a strife betweene the Lordes of Scotlande, that she and her husband like banished persons came into England, and wrote to the king for mercie and comfort. The king euer enclyned to mercy, sent them apparell, vessell, & all things necessarie, willyng them to lye stil in Northũberland, till they knew farther of his pleasure: And so they lay still at Harbottell, and the Queene was deliuered of a fayre Lady called Margaret, and all the Countrey were commaunded by the king to do them pleasure.

Ye haue heard the last yere howe the Queene of Scottes with her husband was come for succor into England, and lay at Harbottell in Northumberland, till the kinges pleasure was to sende for them. So he like a naturall brother sent for her & her husband to come to his Court for their solace. For the which kindnesse the Erle humbly thanked the king, and promysed to geue his attendaunce on the Queene his wife to the Court: whereupon the king sent William Blacknall Esquier, Clerke of his Spicery, with siluer vessell, plate and other thinges necessary for the conueyaunce of her, and sent to her all maner of officers for her estate conuenient. And when she was redy to depart, she asked for her husband, but he was departed into Scotland and left her alone, nothing remembring his promise, which sodain departing much made her to muse: howbeit the Lords of England greatly encouraged her to kepe her promise with ꝑ king her brother: and so after she was somewhat appeased, she set forward, & in euery towne she was well receiued, & so on the third day of May she made her entry into London, ridyng on a whyte palfray (which the Queene of England had sent to her) behynd sir Thomas Par richely beseene, and with great companie of Lordes and Ladies, thee rode through the Citie to Baynardes Castell, and from thence she was conueyed to Grenewich, and there receyued ioyously of the king, the Queene, the French Queene her sister, and highly was she feasted. And when the king heard that ꝑ Erle of Angus her husband was departed, he sayd, it was done like a Scot. This Queene sometyme was at the Court, and sometime at Baynardes Castell, and so she continued in England all this yere.

This moneth of May were sent out of England .xij. hundred Masons, and Carpenters, and three hundreth labourers to the Citie of Tournay: for the king and his Counsail considering that the garrison that was kept there, was chargeable, and therefore it was determined that there should be buylded a Castell to chastice the City if they rebelled, and to minishe the garrison. And therefore these workemen were sent thether, which this yere began a strong Castell, and wrought still on it.

The great costes that the king bestowed on Tournay.

This

Iustice ministred by Cardinall Wolsey.

This yeare by the Cardinall were all men called to accompt that had the occupiyng of the kinges money in the warres or else where, not to euerye mans contentation, for some were found in arrerages, and some saued themselues by pollery and briborye, and waxed riche, and some innocentes were punished. And for a truth he so punished periurye with open punishment and open papers wering, that in his time it was lesse vsed. He punished also Lordes, Knightes, and men of all sortes for ryots, berying and mayntenyng in their countries, that the poore men liued quyetly, so that no man durst beare for feare of imprisonement: The poore people perceyued that he punished the riche, then they complayned without number, and brought many an honest man to trouble and veration. And when the Cardinall at the last had perceyued their vntrew surmises and fayned complaintes for the most part, he then waxed wery of hering their causes, and ordayned by the kings commission, diuers vnder Courtes to here complaintes by byll of poore people. The one was kept in white Hall, the other before the kinges Almoner Doctor Stokesley, a man that had more learning, then descretion to be a Iudge. The thirde was kept in the Lorde Treasorers chamber beside the Starre Chamber, and the fourth at the Rolles at the after noone. These Courtes were greatly haunted for a time but at the last the people perceyued that much delay was vsed in these Courtes, and fewe matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the lawe, then euery man was wery of them and resorted to the common law.

In the moneth of October came into England Mathew Bishop of Sedonon and Cardinall, called commonly the Cardinall of Swytches, from the Emperour Maximilian. This Cardinall was a wise man and of great boldnes, and was well entertained in the Court of the king. And at his contemplation and for olde loue, the king lent to the Emperor Maximilian a great somme of money: wherof the company of Friscobald, and Anthony Caueler Genenoy vndertooke the exchaung, but they payed not the Emperour at his day, notwithstanding they had receyued the money of the king. This Friscobald and Anthony Caueler by meanes of rewardes, geuen to great Lordes of the Counsaile borrowed of the kyng. xxx. thousande pounde and had long dayes for the payment: but Friscobalde was shortly consumed, and Anthony Caueler could not be sene, and so the king was not payed at his dayes, and many English Marchants were by these men vndone, for they spent liberally of euery mans goods.

In this season the Genowayes, Frenchmen and other straungers sayd and boasted themselues to be in suche fauour with the king and hys counsayle, that they set naught by the rulers of the Citie: and the multitude of straungers was so great about London, that the poore Englishe artificers could scarce get any lyuing: And most of al the straungers were so prowde, that they disdayned, mocked and oppressed the Englishmen, which was the beginning of the grudge. For among all other thinges there was a Carpenter in London called Wylliamson, which bought two stocke Doues in Chepe, and as he was about to pay for them, a Frenchman tooke them out of his hande, and sayde they were not meat for a Carpenter: well sayde the Englishe man I haue bought them, and now payde for them, and therefore I will haue them, nay sayde the Frenchman I will haue them for my

Lorde

Lorde the Ambaſſadour, and ſo for better or worſe, the Frenchman called the Engliſhe man knaue, and went away with the ſtocke Doues. The ſtraungers came to the Frenche Ambaſſadour, and ſurmiſed a complaynt againſt the poore Carpenter, and the Ambaſſadour came to my Lorde Maior, and ſayde ſo much, that the Carpenter was ſent to priſon: and yet not contented with this, ſo complayned to the kings counſayle, that the kings commaundement was layde on him. And when ſyr John Baker knight and other worſhipfull perſons ſued to the Ambaſſadour for him, he aunſwered by the body of God that the Engliſhe knaue ſhould looſe his lyfe, for he ſayde no Engliſhe man ſhould denie that the Frenche men requyred, and other aunſwere had they none. The pryde of Frenchmen.

Alſo a Frenchman that had ſlayne a man, ſhould abiure the realme and had a croſſe in his hande, and then ſodainely came a great ſort of Frenchmen about him, and one of them ſayde to the Conſtable that led him, ſyr is thys croſſe the pryce to kill an Engliſhe man. The Conſtable was ſomewhat aſtonied and aunſwered not. Then ſayde another Frenchman, on that pryce we would be baniſhed all by the maſſe, thys ſaying was noted to be ſpoken ſpitefully. Howbeit, the Frenchmen were not alonly oppreſſors of the Engliſhe men, for a Lombarde called Fraunces de bard, entiſed a mans wyfe in Lombarde ſtreete to come to his Chamber with her huſbandes plate, which thing ſhe did. After when her huſband knew it, he demaunded hys wyfe, but anſwere was made he ſhould not haue her, then he demaũded his plate, and in like maner anſwere was made that he ſhould neyther haue plate nor wife. And when he had ſued an action againſt the ſtraunger in the Guyldehall, the ſtraunger ſo faced the Engliſhe man, that he faynted in his ſute. And then the Lombard arreſted ỹ poore man for his wyfes boord, while he kept her from her huſband in his chamber. This mocke was much noted, & for theſe & many other oppreſſions done by them, there encreaſed ſuch a malice in the Engliſhe mens hartes: that at the laſt it braſt out. For amongſt other that ſore grudged at theſe matters, there was a broker in London called John Lyncolne, which wrote a bill before Eaſter, deſiring Docter Standiche at hys ſermon at ſaint Marie Spittell the Monday in Eaſter weeke, to moue the Maior and Aldermen, to take part with the commonaltie againſt the ſtraũgers. The Doctor aunſwered that it became not him to moue any ſuch thing in a ſermon. From him he departed, and came to a Chanon in ſaint Mary Spittel, a Doctor in deuinitie, called Docter Bele, & lamentably declared to him, how miſerably the cõmon artificers lyued, & ſcarce could get any worke to find them, their wifes and children, for there were ſuch a number of artificers ſtraungers, that toke away all their liuing in maner. And alſo how the Engliſh Marchants could haue no vtteraunce for their marchandice, for the Marchaunt ſtraungers, bring in all ſilkes, cloth of Golde, Wine, Oyle, Iron, and ſuch other marchaundiſe, that no man almoſt byeth of an Engliſh man. And alſo outwarde they carie ſo much Engliſhe Wolle, Cloth, Tynne, and Leade, that Engliſhe men that auenture outwarde, can haue no lyuing: Which things ſayde Lyncolne hath bene ſhewed to the counſayle, and cannot be heard. And farther ſayde he, the ſtraungers compaſſe the Citie rounde about, in Southwarke, in Weſtmynſter, Temple barre, Holborne, Saint Martins, Saint Johns ſtreete, Algate, Towre hill, and ſaint Katherynes, John Lyncolne the firſt author of the inſurrection of euill May day.

and forest all the market, so that no good thing for them commeth to the market: which is the cause that Englishe men want and sterue, and they lyue habundantly in great pleasure. Wherfore sayde Lyncolne maister Doctor, sith you were borne in London, and see the oppression of the straungers, and the great miserie of your awne natiue Countrie, exhort all the Citezens to ioyne in one against these straungers, raueners and destroyers of your Countrie. Maister Doctor hearing this, sayde he much lamented the case, if it were as Lyncolne had declared, yes sayde Lyncolne that it is and much more, for the Dutchmen bring ouer Iron, Tymber, Leather and Weynkot readie wrought, as Nayles, Lockes, Baskets, Cubbordes, Stooles, Tables, Chestes, Girdels, with Poyntes, Sadels and painted clothes, so that if it were wrought here, the Englishe men might haue some worke and lyuing by it. And beside this they grow into such a multitude that it is to be looked vpon, for I sawe on a Sunday this Lent fyre hundred straungers shooting at the Popyngay with Crosbowes, and they kepe suche assemblies and fraternities together, and make such a gathering to their common bore, that euery Botcher will holde plee with the Citie of London: well sayde the Doctor, I will doe for a reformation of this matter as much as a priest may doe, and so receaued Lyncolnes byll and studied for his purpose. Then Lyncolne very ioyous of his enterprise went from man to man, saying that shortly they should heare newes, and daylie excited yong people and artificers to beare malice to the straungers. When Easter came and Doctor Bele should preach, the Tuesday in Easter weeke, he came into the Pulpit, and there declared that to him was brought a pittifull byll, and red it in this wise. To all you the worshipfull Lordes and maysters of this Citie, that will take compassion ouer the poore people your neyghbours, and also of the great importable hurtes, losses, and hynderaunces, whereof proceedeth the extreme pouertie to all the kinges subiectes that inhabite within thys Citie and suburbes of the same, for so it is that the alyens and straungers eate the breade from the pore fatherlesse children, and take the lyuing from all the artificers, and the entercourse from all marchauntes, whereby pouertie is so much encreased that euerye man bewayleth the miserie of other, for craftes men be brought to beggerie, and marchauntes to needinesse: wherefore the premisses considered, the redresse must be of the commons, knyt and vnyte to one part, as the hurt and dammage greeueth all men, so must all men set to their wylling power for remedie, and not to suffer the sayde alyens so highly in their wealth, and the naturall borne men of this region to come to confusion. Of thys letter was more, but the Doctor red no farther, and then began Cœlum cœli domino, terram autem dedit filiis hominum, and vpon this text he intreated, that this lande was geuen to Englishe men, and as byrdes would defend their nest, so ought English men to cherishe and defende themselues, and to hurt and greeue aliens for the common weale. And vpon this text pugna pro patria, he brought in, howe by Gods lawe it was lawfull to fight for their Countrie, and euer he subtilly moued the people to rebell agaynst the straungers, and breake the kings peace, nothing regarding the league betwene Princes and the kings honor. Of this sermon many a light person tooke courage, and openly spake agaynst straungers. And as the Deuill would, the Sunday after at Grenewiche in the kings Gallery was Fraun-

ces de bard, which as you harde kept an Englith mans wyfe and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie, and with him were Dempngo, Anthony Caueler, and manye mo straungers, and there they talkyng with syr Thomas Palmer knight, iested and laughed howe that Fraunces kept the Englishe mans wyfe, saiyng that if they had the Maiors wyfe of London, they woulde keepe her: Syr Thomas sayde, syrs you haue to muche fauour in England. There were dyuers Englishe Marchaunts by, and hard them laugh, and were not content, in so much as one William Bolt a Mercer sayde, well you whoreson Lombardes, you reioyse and laugh, by the masse we will one day haue a day at you, come when it will, and that saiyng the other Marchaunts affirmed. Thys tale was reported about London, and the yong and euill disposed people sayde, they would be reuenged on the Marchaunt straungers, as well as on the artificers straungers.

Upon this rumour the. xxviii. daye of Apzill, diuerse young men of the City assauted the Aliens as they passed by the strets, and some were striken and some bufketed, and some throwen in the canel. Wherfore the Maior sent diuerse persons to ward, as Stephyn Studley Skynner, and Bettes and Stephenson and diuerse other, some to one Counter, and some to another, and some to Newgate. Then sodainly was a common rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on May daye next, the Citie would rebell and slaye all Aliens, insomuch as diuers straungers fled out of the Citie. This bruit ranne so farre that it came to the kinges counsaile, insomuch as the Cardinall being Lorde Chauncelor, sent for John Rest Maior of the Citie, and other of the counsaile of the Citie, and demaunded of the Maior in what case the Citie stoode, to whome he aunswered that it was well and in good quyet: Nay sayd the Cardinal, it is informed vs that your yong and ryotous people will rise and distresse the Straungers, heare ye of no such thing? No surely sayd the Maior, and I trust so to gouerne them that the kinges peace shal be obserued, and that I dare vndertake, if I and my brethren the Aldermen may be suffered. Well sayd the Cardinall, go home and wisely forese this matter, for if any such thing be you may shortely preuent it. The Maior came from the Cardinal at foure of the clock in the after none on May euen, and demaũded of the officers what they heard, diuers of them answered that the voyce of the people was so, and had bene so two or three dayes before. This heering the Maior sent for all his brethren to the Guylde hall in great hast, and almost seuen of the clocke or the assemble was sette. Then was declared to them by Maister Brooke the Recorder how that the kinges counsaile had reported to them that the Comminaltie that night woulde rise, and distresse all the Aliens and straungers that inhabited in the Citie of London: the Aldermen answered they hard say so, but they mistrusted not the matter, but yet they sayde it was well done to foresee it. Then sayd the Recorder, it were best that a substantiall watch were set of honest persones, housholders, which might withstand the euill doers. An Alderman sayd, that it was euill to raise men to harneis, for if such a thing were entended, they could not tell who would take their part. Another Alderman sayd, that it were best to kepe the yong men a sunder and euery man to shut his dores, and to kepe his seruauntes within. Then with these opinions was the Recorder sent to the Cardinall before eyght of the clocke, and then he with such as were of the kinges counsaile at his place, commaunded that in no wise watch shoulde be kept, but that euery man should repaire to his owne house, and there to keepe him and his seruauntes tyll seauen of the clocke of the morning: with which commaundement, the sayd Richard Brooke Sergeaunt at the lawe and Recorder, and sir Thomas Moore, late vnder shriue of London, and then of the kinges counsaile, came to the Guilde hall halfe howre and before nine of the clocke, and there shewed the commaundement of the kinges counsaile. Then in all hast, euery Alderman sent to his warde that no man should stirre after nine of the clocke out of his house, but to kepe his doores shutte, and his seruantes within tyll seauen of the clocke in the morning. After this commaundement, syr John Mondye Alderman came from his warde, and found two yong men in Chepe playyng at Bucklers, and a great company of yong men loking on them for the commaundement was then scace knowne, for then it was but nine of the clocke. Maister Mondy seing that, bade them leaue, and the one yong man asked hym why? and then he sayde thou shalt knowe, and toke him by the arme to haue had him to the Counter. Then al the yong men resisted the Alderman, and toke him from maister Mondy, & cryed Prentyses and clubs. Then out of euerie doze came clubs and weapons and the Alderman fled, and was in great daunger. Then more people arose out of euery quarter, and out came Seruingmen, and Watermen, and Courtiers, and by a. rj. of the clocke there were in Chepe six or seauen hundred. And out of Paules Churchyarde came three. C. which wist not of the other, and so out of all places they gathered, and brake vp the Counters, and tooke out the prisoners, that the Maior had thether committed for hurting of the straungers, and came to Newgat and tooke out Studley and Petyt, committed thether for that cause. The Maior and Shrifes were there present, and made Proclamation in the kinges name, but nothing was obeyed. Thus they ran a plumpe through Saint Nicholas Shambles, and at saint Martins gate there met with them syr Thomas Moore and other, desiring them to go to their lodginges: And as they were intreating, and had almost brought them to a stay. The people of Saint Martines threw out stones and batts, and hurte diuers honest personnes, that were perswading the ryotus people to cease, and they bade them hold their handes, but still they threw out briches and hoate water. Then a Sergeaunt of Armes called Nicholas Downes, which was there with Maister Moore, entreating them, being sore hurt, in a fury cryed downe with them. Then all the misruled persones ranne to the doores and windowes of saint Martins, and spoyled all that they found, and cast it into the strete, and left fewe houses vnspoyled. And after that they ranne hedlyng into Cornehill by Leaden Halle, to the house of one Mutuas a Frenchman or Picarde borne, which was a great bearer of Frenchmen, were they Pyckpursses, or how euill disposicion soeuer they were of, and within hys gate, called Grenegate, dwelled diuers Frenchmen that kalendred Worsted, contrary to the kings lawes: and al they were so borne out by the same Mutuas, that no man durst meddle with them, wherefore he was sore hated, and if the people had founde him in their fury, they would haue striken of his head: but when they found him not, the Watermen, and certain yong persones that were there fell to ryflyng: some ranne to Blanchchapelton, and brake the straungers houses, and threw shooes and bootes into the strete: Thus from ten or a leauen of the clock, continued these ryotous people, duryng which tyme a knight called syr Thomas Parre, in great haste went to the Cardinall and tolde hym of this ryot which incontinent strengthned his house with men and ordinaunce. And after, this knight roade to the king to Richmond, and made the report more then it was: Wherefore the king hastely sent to London, and was truely aduertised of the matter, and how that the ryot was ceassed, and many of the doers apprehended. But while this ruffling continued, Sir Richard Cholmeley knight Lieutenaunt of the Towre, no great friende to the Citie in a frantike fury losed certayne peeces of ordinaunce, and shot into the Citie, which did litle harme howbeit his good will appered. About three of the clock, these ryotous persons seuered themselues and went to their places of resort, and by the waye they were taken by the Maior and the Heds of the Citie, and some sent to the Tower, and some to Newgate, and some to the Counters, to the number of three hundred, some fled and especially the Watermen, and Seruingmen, but the poore prentises were taken. About fiue of the clocke, the Erles of Shrewsbury and Surrey, which had heard of this ryot, came to London with such strength as they had, so did the Innes of Courte, and diuers noble men: but or they came, all the ryot was ceassed, and many taken as you haue heard.

Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of Doctor Bele called to remembraunce, and he taken and sent to the Tower, and so was John Lincolne: but with this ryot the Cardinall was sore displeased. Then the fourth day of May was an Oyer and determiner at London before the Maior, the Duke of Norffolke, the Erle of Surrey and other. The Citye thought that the Duke bare them grudge for a lewde priest of his, which the yere before was slaine in Chepe, insomuch the Duke then in his fury sayde, I pray God I may once haue the Citizens in my daunger: and the Duke also thought that they bare him no good will, wherefore he came into the Citie with .xiij. hundreth men in harnesse to kepe the Oyer and determiner. And vpon examination, it could neuer be proued of any meetyng, gatheryng, talkyng or conuenticle at any day or tyme before that day, but that the chaunce so happened without any matter prepensed of any creature sauyng Lyncoln, and neuer an honest person in maner was taken but onely he. Then Proclamations were made that no women should come together to babble and talke, but all men should kepe their wyues in theyr houses. All the stretes that were notable stood full of harnessed men, which spake many opprobrious wordes to the Citizens, which grieued them sore: and if they would haue bene reuenged, the other had had the worse, for the Citizens were two hundred to one: but lyke true subiects they suffered paciently.

When the Lordes were set, the prisoners were brought in through the stretes tyed in ropes, some men, some laddes, some children of .xiij. yere. There was a great mournyng of fathers and friendes for their children and kinsfolke. Among the prisoners manye were not of the Citye, some were priestes and some husbandmen and labourers, and they were all arreigned of Treason. The cause of the Treason was, because the king had warre with all christen Princes, that they had broken the truce and league contrary to the ſtatute of king Henry the fift. Of this treaſon diuers were endited, and ſo for that tyme the Lordes departed. And the nert day the duke came againe, and the Erle of Surrey with two thouſand armed men, which kept the ſtretes. When the Maior, the Duke, and the Erle of Shrewſbury and Surrey were ſet, the priſoners were arreigned, and. xiij. founde guiltie of high treaſon, and adiudged to be hanged, drawen and quartered, & for the execution hereof, were ſet vp a. xj. payre of Gallowes in diuers places where the offences were done, as at Algate, at Blanchechapelton, Gracious ſtrete, Leaden hall, and before euery Counter one, and at Newgate, at Saint Martyns, at Alderſgate, at Biſhopſgate. This ſight ſore grieued the people to ſee Galowes ſet vp in the kings Chamber. Then were the priſoners that were indged, brought to the places of execution, and executed in moſt rigorous maner, for the Lorde Edmond Haward, ſonne to the Duke of Norfolke, and knight Marſhall ſhewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie, to the poore ponglynges in their execution, and likewyſe the Dukes ſeruauntes ſpake many opprobrious wordes, ſome bad hang, ſome bad draw, ſome bad ſet the Citie on fyre, but all was ſuffered.

John Lincolne with other put to death.

On Thurſday the. viij. day of May was Lyncolne, Shyrwyn, and two brethren called Bets, and dyuers other adiudged to dye. Then Lincolne ſayde, my Lordes, I meant well, for, and you knewe the miſchiefe that is enſued in this realme by ſtraungers, you would remedie it, and many times I haue complayned, and then I was called a buſye felowe: now our Lorde haue mercy on me. Then all the ſayde perſons were layde on the Hardelles, and drawne to the ſtandard in Chepe, and firſt was John Lyncoln executed, and as the other had the rope about their neckes, there came a commaundement from the king to reſpite execution. Then the people cryed, God ſaue the king. Then was the Oyer and determiner deferred tyll another day and the priſoners ſent againe to warde, and the harneſſed men departed out of London, and all thinges quiet.

The. xj. day of May the king came to his Manor of Grenewich, where the recorder of London, & dyuers Aldermen came to ſpeake with his grace, and all ware Gownes of blacke coulor. And when they perceyued the king comming out of his priuie Chamber into his Chamber of preſence, they kneled downe and the Recorder ſaid: Our moſt natural, benigne, and ſouereigne Lorde, we know well that your grace is diſpleaſed with vs of your Citie of London for the great ryot late done: we aſſertaine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honeſt perſon were condiſcendyng to that enormitie, and yet we, our wyues, and children, euery houre lament that your fauour ſhould be taken from vs, and forasmuch as light and ydle perſons were the doers of the ſame, we moſt humbly beſech your grace to haue mercy of vs for our negligence, and compaſſion of the offenders for their offence and treſpaſſe.

Truly ſayd the king, you haue highly diſpleaſed and offended vs, and ye ought to waile and be ſory for the ſame, and where ye ſaye that you the ſubſtanciall perſons were not conſentyng to the ſame, it appereth to the contrary, for you neuer moued to let them, nor ſtirred once to fight with them, which you ſay were ſo ſma'l a number of light perſons, wherfore we muſt thinke, & you cannot denie, but you did winke at the matter, but at this tyme, we will graunt to you neyther our fauour nor good will, nor to the offenders mercy, but resort to the Cardinall oure Chauncelour, and he shall make you an aunswere, and declare our pleasure, and with this answere the Londoners departed and made relation to the Maior.

The. xviij. day of this Moneth the Queene of Scottes, which had bene at the Court, and at Baynards Castell, a whole yere at the kinges charge, and was richly appoynted of all thinges mete to her estate, both of Jewels, Plate, Tapistry, Arras, Coyne, Horses, and all other thinges of the kinges gift and liberalitie, departed out of London towarde Scotlande wyth great riches, albeit she came into England with much powertie, and she entred into Scotland the. xiij. day of June, whom her husband receyued at Barwick: but the English men small hym regarded. All her charges within the realme, commyng to the Court and returnyng, were of the kinges purse. The Queene of Scottes returneth into Scotland to her husband.

Thursday the. xvij. day of May, the king came into Westminster hall, for whome at the vpper ende was set a cloth of estate, and the place hanged with Arras, with hym was the Cardinall, the Dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke the Erles of Shrewsbury, of Esser, Wilshire and of Surrey, with manye Lordes and other of the kinges Counsale. The Maior and Aldermen, and all the chief of the City were there in their best liuery (according as the Cardinall had them appoynted) by. ix. of the clocke. Then the king commaunded that all the prisoners should be brought foorth. Then came in the poore ponglings and olde false knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their shirtes, and euery one a Halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and. xj. women. And when all were come before the kings presence, the Cardinall fore layd to the Maior and commonaltie their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared that they had deserued death for their offence: Then all the prisoners together cryed mercy gracious Lorde, mercy. Then the Lordes altogether besought his grace of mercy, at whose request the king pardoned them all. And then the Cardinall gaue vnto them a good exhortation to the great gladnesse of the heerers. And when the generall pardon was pronounced, all the prisoners showted at once, and altogether cast vp their Halters into the Hall rooffe, so that the king might perceyue they were none of the discretest sort. Here is to be noted that dyuers offenders which were not taken, heeryng that the king was inclined to mercye, came well apparayled to Westminster, and sodainlye stripped them into their shirtes with halters, and came in among the prisoners willyngly, to be partakers of the kinges pardon, by the which doyng, it was well knowen that one John Gelson yoman of the Crowne, was the first that beganne to spoyle, and exhorted other to do the same, and because he fled and was not taken, he came in the rope with the other prisoners, & so had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke Wagon. Then were all the Galowes within the Citie taken downe, and many a good prayer sayde for the king, and the Citizens tooke more heede to their seruants. King Henry the eight came to Westminster hall, and there sat himselfe in iudgement. The king pardoneth all the rebels.

After this, sodainly there came a plague of sickenesse, called the sweatyng sickenesse. This malady was so cruell that it killed some within three houres, some within two houres, some merry at dinner, and dead at supper. Many dyed in the kinges Court, the Lord Clinton, the Lorde Grey of Wilton, and many knightes, Gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Mighelmas terme was adiourned, and because that this maladie continued from July The sweating sickenesse to the middes of December, the king kept himselfe euer with a small companie, and kept no solempne Christmasse, willyng to haue no resort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in some one town halfe the people dyed, and in some other towne the third part, the Sweate was so feruent, and the infections so great.

1517 9

In the beginning of this yere, Trinitie terme was begon at Oxenford, where it continued but one daye, and was againe adiourned to Westminster. This yere came to Calice from Pope Leo, a Legate de latere, called Laurence Campeius, commonly called the Cardinall Campeius, for to exhort the king to make warre on the Turke. And likewise the sayde Leo sent three other Legates foorth at that time for the sayde purpose, one into Fraunce, another into Spaine, and the third into Germany.

Cardinall Campeius sent into England.

When the Cardinall of Yorke knew that there was comming a Legate into England, which should haue a greater preheminence then a Cardinall, he whose ambition was neuer satisfied, caused a Byshop and certayne Doctors to passe the Sea to Calice to welcome him, and to shewe to him that if he would haue the Popes purpose, to take any effect in Englande, he should in any wise sende in poste to Rome, to haue the sayde Cardinall of Yorke to be Legate also, and to be ioyned in commission with him, which thing was done (not without good rewardes) so that in thirtie and fiue dayes, the Bull was brought to Calice. During which time the Cardinall of Yorke sent to the Legate to Calice, red cloth to clothe his seruauntes, which at their comming to Calice, were but meanely apparelled. And when all things were readie, he passed the Sea and landed at Douer, and so kept forth his iorney toward London. At euery towne as they passed, he was receyued with procession, and accompanied with all the Lords and Gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blackheth, there met him the Duke of Norffolke, with a great number of Prelates, knightes and Gent'emen, all richely apparelled. And in the waye he was brought into a riche Tent of cloth of Golde, where he shifted hymselfe into a robe of a Cardynall, edged wyth Ermynes, and so tooke his Moyle ryding toward London.

The night before he came to London, the Cardinall of Yorke, to furnishe the cariages of the Cardinall Campeius, sent to him twelue Mulets with emptie Cofers couered with red, which twelue Mulets were led thorough London, amongst the Mulets of Campeius, which were but eyght and so these twentie Mulets passed through the streetes, as though they had bene full of treasures, apparell, and other necessaries. And when they came into Chepe, one of the Mulets brake from her keeper, and ouerthrewe the Chestes, and ouerturned two or three other Mulets cariages, which fell with such a violence, that dyuers of them vnlocked, and out of some fell olde hosen, broken Shoen, and roasted Flesshe, peeces of bread, Egges, and much vile baggage: at which sight the boyes cryed, see, see, my Lorde Legates treasure, and so the Muleters were ashamed, and tooke vp all their stuffe, and passed forth. And about three of the clock at after none, on the .xxix. daye of July the sayde Legate entred the Citie, and in Southwarke met him all the Clergie of London, with Crosses, Sensers, and Copes, and sensed him with great reuerence. The Maior and Aldermen, and all the occupations of the Citie in their best lyueries stoode in the streetes, and him highly honored: red: to whome syr Thomas Moore made a briefe oration in the name of the Citie: And when he came to Paules, there he was receyued by Bysshops Mitred, and vnder a Canapie entred the Church: which Canapy his seruaunts tooke for their fees. And when he had offered he gaue his benediction to all the people, and tooke agayne hys Mule, and so was wyth all hys traine afore sayde, conueyed to Bathe place, and there rested: where he was welcommed of the Cardinall of Yorke. And on Sundaynext ensuyng, these two Cardinalles as Legates, tooke their Barges and came to Grenewiche, eche of them had beside their Crosses two pillers of Siluer, two little Ares guylt, and two cloke bagges embroudered, and the Cardinals Hats borne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the Cardinall of Yorke went on the right hande: and there the king royally apparelled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome, and so brought them both vp into his Chamber of presence, and there was a solempne oration made by an Italian, declaryng the cause of the Legacie to be in two articles, one for ayde agaynst Gods enemies, and the second for reformation of the Clergie. And when masse was done, they were had to a Chamber, and serued with Lords and knightes, with much solempnitie: and after dinner they tooke their leaue of the king and came to London, and rode through the Citie together in great pompe and glorie to their lodgings.

When the Cardinall of Yorke was thus a Legate, he set vp a Court, and called it the Court of the Legate, and proued Testamentes, and heard causes to the great hinderaunce of all the Bysshops of the realme. He visited Bysshops and all the Clergie, exempt and not exempt, and vnder couler of reformation he gat much treasure, and nothing was reformed, but came to more mischiefe: for by example of his pride, priestes and all spirituall persons wared so prowde, that they wore Ueluet, and silke, both in Gownes, Jackets, Doblets, and shoes, kept open lecherie, and so highly bare themselues by reason of his auethorities and faculties, that no man durst once reproue any thing in them, for feare to be called heretike, and then they would make him smoke or beare a Faggot. And the Cardinall himselfe was so prowde, that he thought himselfe egall with the king: and when he had sayd Masse, he made Dukes and Erles to serue him of Wyne with a sate taken, and to holde the Bason at the Lauatories. Thus the pride and ambition of the Cardinall and Clergie was so high, that in maner all good persons abhorred and disdeyned it.

The Cardinalles court called the Court Legantyne.

Thys yere the Frenche king wrote to the king of Englande, that if it were his pleasure, he would send an Ambassade into Englande, to common with the king and his counsayle for the redeeming of the Citie of Tournay, and other things: which aunswered the messenger, that the Ambassade of the French king should be right hartily welcome to him. And so the French king sent into Englande the Lorde Boneuet, high Admirall of Fraunce, and the Bysshop of Parys as chiefe Ambassadors accompanied with many noble men, and yong freshe Galaunts of the court of Fraunce, to the number of lxxx. and more, and then came a great number of rascall Pedlers, and Jewellers, and brought ouer Hattes and Cappes, and dyuers Marchaundise vncustomed, all vnder the colour of the trussery of the Ambassadours.

Imbassadors sent out of Fraunce to the king of England.

After that these noble men were landed at Douer, they were receyued by

by the Nobles and Gentlemen of the Countrey, and so conueyed from lodging to lodging till they came to Blackheth, and before them went their carriages and people in great number, to the summe of twelue hundred one an other, which was thought to be to many for an Ambassade. These Gentlemen of Fraunce were very freshe.

The Erle of Surrey receyueth the Ambassadors.

Monday the. xxvij. daye of September, the Erle of Surrey high Admyrall of Englande, in a coate of rich Tissue cut on cloth of siluer, on a great courser richely trapped, and a great Whistell of Golde, set with stones and pearle, hangyng at a great and massy Chayne baudrick wise, accompanied with an hundred and.lx. Gentlemen, richly appareled, on goodly horses came to Blackheth, and there amiably receaued the Ambassadors of Fraunce. The yong galants of Fraunce had coates garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue partes verie richely to beholde: and so all the Englishe men accoupled themselues with the French men louingly together, and so reade to London. After the two Admyralls folowed. xxiij. of the Frenche kinges Garde, whome accompanyed. xxiiij. of the kings Garde. And after them a great number of archers, to the number of foure hundred. And in this order they passed thorough the Citie to Taylers hall, and there the chiefe Ambassadors were lodged, and the remnaunt in Marchaunts houses about. When these Lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men open their wares, and made Taylers hall lyke to the paunde of a marte. At this doyng many an Englishe man grudged, but it auayled not. The last daye of September, the French Ambassadors tooke their Barge, & came to Grenewiche. The Admyrall was in a Gowne of cloth of siluer rayled, furred with ryche Sables, and all his company almost were in a newe fassion garment, called a Shemew, which was in effect a Gowne, cut in the middle. The Gentlemen of Fraunce were brought to the kings presence, where the Bishop of Parys made a solempne oration: which beyng ended, and aunswere made thereto, the king highly enterteyned the Admirall and his company, and so did all the Englishe Lordes and Gentlemen. The Ambassadors beyng daylie in counsayle at Grenewiche, the other Gentlemen daunced and passed the time in the Queenes chamber with Ladies and Gentlewomen.

An agremẽt that the City of Tournay should again be deliuered to the frenchmen.

After long counsayling and much desiring of the French king and his counsayle, it was agreed that the Citie of Tournay should be deliuered to the French king, he paiyng fiue hundred thousand Crownes for the Citie, and foure hundred thousand Crownes for the Castell, the which the king had buylded, but it was not fully performed: and also he should pay. xxiij. thousand pound Tourneys, the which summe the Citizens of the Citie of Tourney ought to the king of Englande for their liberties and fraunchises.

Upon these agrementes to be performed it was concluded that the City of Tourney should be deliuered to the French king. The Frenchmen the soner to come to their purpose, made a pretence of mariage to be had, betwene the Dolphin, sonne and heyre to the French king and the Ladye Mary the kinges daughter, which was agred vpon this condicion, that if they both consented at lawfull age, then to be firme and stable, or else not: for then they were both very yong. And so all matters were concluded, and the Erle of Worcester and the Bishop of Ely appoynted to go into Fraunce for the deliuery of the Citie of Tourney, and performing of the other agrementes. And for the sure payment of the summes of money to be paide to the king of England, vpon the sayd agrements, there were foure Gentelmen of the realme of Fraunce, left in England for hostages: whose names were Mounsire Memorancy, Mounsier Monpesart, Mounsier Moy, Moūsier Morret. Of the which foure the two first named were of noble bloud, but the two last were but of meane houses. And because they were yong, there was auncient Gentlemen appointed gouernors to them.

When all thinges were concluded and sealed, the king and all the Ambassadours richely appareled, and the two Legates roade solempnly to the Church of Saint Paul from the Bishop of Durhams place: and there was made from the West doore to the Quere doore of the Church, egall with the highest step, a haute pace of timber twelue foote broad, that the king and the Ambassadours might be sene. And there the Cardinall of Yorke sang high Masse, and had his cloth of estate of Tyssue: his Cupbord set with Basons all guilt couered: his place was fiue steppes high. At the first lauatory, three Erles serued him, and at the second two Dukes and a Marques, and with the allay taken, they gaue hym wine, and after water. And when the Masse was done, the Cardinall Campeius and he gaue to the people (as they sayd) cleane remission. And after that done, Doctor Pace the kinges Secretary a man verie eloquent, made a goodly Oration in praise of peace: and that done, the king and all his Nobles and Ambassadours went to the Bishops palace to dynner, where they were highly feasted. And after dynner, the king roade againe to the Bishop of Durhams place.

After diuerse Justes and feastes made, the sayd Ambassadours by the king and the Lordes: Sir Thomas Ermew Maior of London, made to them a costly dynner at the Goldsmithes hall, which dinner they highly praysed, it was so well ordered.

And when time came, they tooke their leaue of the king, the Quene, and the kinges Counsaile, and deliuered into the kings possession their foure hostages as you haue heard before: at which departing the king gaue to the Admirall of Fraunce a garnish of guilt vessell, a payre of couered Basons guilt, twelue great guilt Bowles, foure payre of great guilt Pottes, a standing Cup of Gold, garnished with great Perle: and to some other also, he gaue plate, to some Cheines of Gold, to some rich apparell, and to some great horses with rich bardes, so that euery gentleman was wel rewarded: which liberalitie the straungers much praysed: and after that all their trusses were ready they departed towarde the sea, and tooke ship and landed at Boleyn.

Sone after their departing, the Erle of Worcester being the kinges Chamberlayn: The Bishop of Ely, the Lorde of Saint Johns, sir Nicholas Vaure, sir John Pechy, Sir Thomas Bulleyn as Ambassadours from the king of England, accompanied with .lxx. knights and gentelmen and yomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, passed the sea with some stormes, and came to Calice, and passed through Picardie with great and kinde entertaynment in all places tyll they came to Paris, where they were noblye receyued, euery man matched with a like pere: and after they were brought to the French kinges presence, where the Bishop of Elye made a solempne Oration, as concerning the mariage and the peace: he did it with such a bold spirite that the Frenchmen much praysed his audacitie.

Ambassadours sent from the king of England vnto the french king.

The

Peace concluded.

The conclusyon of this peace was this, that Henrye king of England, Fraunces king of Frenchmen, and Charles king of Castell had swoyne a perpetuall peace, during their liues. And if it should happen any of the thre to violate the league in any poynt and to moue warre: then the other two shoulde ioyne together and make warre against the violater or breaker of the peace.

After all thinges concluded, the Erle of Worcester, and with him Sir Nicholas Vaux, sir John Pechy, sir Edwarde Belknap, with many other knightes tooke their leaue of the French king, and roade to Tournay, where they were well receyued. Then began the Capitaynes and the Souldiours to mourne, knowing that the towne should be yelded to the French king, and many a yong Gentleman, and many a tall yoman, wished that they had not spent their tyme there. And the next day after, the sayde Erle discharged sir Richard Jernyngham of his office of Capitaine, and commaunded euery man to be obedient to the kinges pleasure, and to prepare to returne into England. The. viij. day of Februarye, the Lord Chastileon came nere to the Citie of Tournay with. xxj. hundreth men in harnesse. The Erle of Worcester sent sir Edward Belknap to knowe his commission, and there he shewed him his Commission, which was to receiue the Citie of Tournay. Then sir Edward Belknap desired him to send his commission to the Erle of Worcester, which he refused to do, saiyng it was sufficient to shewe it: well sayde sir Edward Belknap you must vnderstand that we haue a commission from the king our Maister to deliuer you the Citie at a day appoynted: wherfore we must shew the king of England both your commissiō that you had authoritie to receiue it frō the french king, & also that you by your indenture sealed with your seale of armes, shal cōfesse ỹ you receyued the Citie as a gift, & not rendred as a right to the king your Maister, or else be you sure that the Citie shall not be deliuered. They the Lord Chastileon was wonderous wroth that he was no better beleued: And so dayly were great messages sent to the Citie from him to the Erle of Worcester, and aunsweres were sent of the Englishe part. But when the day approched, he had full aunswere that he must deliuer his commission, and also seale the indenture, or else the English men would not put him in possession of the towne, for their commission was otherwise. The French Capitaynes perceiuyng that if they disagreed at the day, that doubtes might follow: wherefore they sent their commission, and sealed their indenture, and sent it likewise in the morning, and came forward with their Banners displayed: whereof heeryng the Erle, he sent word that the Citie was neither yelded, nor gotten, but deliuered for confederation of maryage, and therefore they should not enter with Banners displayed. Then were the Frenchmen angry, but there was no remedie but to rolle vp their Standardes and Banners. And when they came to the Gates, there their commission and Indenture were solemnly read openly: and then the french men entered with Drumslades, and mynstrelsie without any Banner: And then to Mounsire Chastileon was deliuered the Castell, and there he ordeyned watch and warde in euery part. Thus was the Citie of Tournay deliuered the. viij. day of Februarye in the tenth yere of the reigne of the king, and many a tall yoman that lacked liuyng fell to robbyng, which would not labour after their returne.

The maner of the deliuerye of Tournay.

During

Duryng this tyme remayned in the French Court, Nicholas Carew, Fraunces Bryan, and dyuers other of the yong Gentlemen of England, and they with the French king roade dayly disguised through Parys, throwyng egges, stones, and other foolishe tryfles at the people, which light demeanor of a king was much discommended and gested at. And when these yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all French, in eatyng, drinking, and apparell, yea and in French vices and bragges, so that all the estates of England were by them laughed at: the Ladies and gentlewomen were dispraysed, so that nothing by them was praysed, but if it were after the French turne, which after turned them to displeasure as you shall heere.

After the kinges Imbassadors were returned, and Tournay deliuered to the French men, vpon the condicions aforesayde, the hostages that were here left for the payment of the great sommes and performaunce of the condicions comprised in the league (of the which one was, that if the mariage tooke none effect, then the Citie of Tournay should be redeliuered vpon repayment of the same somme) the sayd hostages knewe not in what case they stood, but when they knewe it, they were very heauy and sorowfull: howbeit they dissimuled the matter in the best wise they could.

In the end of March the king sent for al the yomen of the gard that were come from Tournay, and after many good wordes geuen to them, he graunted to them foure pence by the day without attendaunce, except they were specially commaunded: and yet for all this the commonaltie sayde that the king was euill counsayled to geue away the Citie of Tournay, because the maintainyng of a garrison there should haue nourished and brought vp men and yonger brethren in feates of warre to the great strength and defence of the Realme.

This yere the .xij. day of Februarye died the Emperour Maximilian, for whom the king caused a solempne Obsequie to be done at Paules Church, all the Nobles of the realme, and knightes of the Garter beyng present, of which order the sayd Emperour was one. The death of Maximilian Emperor.

In the beginnyng of thys yere, the king with all the knightes of hys order beyng in Englande, road on double horses, with the Henxtemen folowyng the king, from Colbroke to Windsore in gorgious apparell, and there he kept with great solempnity the feast of Saint George, and dyned in the hall. And the Bishop of Winchester Prelate of the order sat at the bordes ende alone. The king was solempnly serued, and the surnap cast lyke the feast of a coronation. All thinges were plenteous to straungers that resorted thether. At the Masse of Requiem was offered, the banner and other hachementes of honour belongyng to Maximilian the Emperour late deceassed. After this feast ended, the king came to Richemond, and so to Grenewich, and there lay all May. 1519

In which moneth the kinges Counsaile secretly commoned together of the kinges gentlenesse and liberalitie to all persons: by the which they perceyued that certaine yong men in his priuie Chamber, not regardyng hys estate nor degree, were so familiar and homely with him, and played suche light touches with him, that they forgat themselues: Which things although the king of his gentle nature suffered, and not reproued it: yet the kinges Counsaile thought it not meete to be suffered for the kings honour, and therfore they altogether came to the king, beſeching him all theſe enormities and lightneſſe to redreſſe. To whome the king aunſwered, that he had choſen them of his Counſaile, both for the maintenaunce of his honour, and for the defence of all thing that might blemiſh the ſame: wherefore if they ſawe any about him miſvſe themſelues, he committed it to their reformation. Then the kinges Counſaile cauſed the Lord Chamberleyn to call before them Carew (and another who yet liueth, & therfore ſhall not at this tyme be named) with diuers other alſo of the priuie Chamber, which had bene in the frenche Court, and baniſhed them the Court for diuers conſiderations, layng nothing perticularly to their charges. And they that had offices were commaũded to go to their offices: which diſcharge out of the Court grieued ſore the heartes of theſe yong men, which were called the kinges Minions. Then was there foure ſad and auncient knightes, put into the kings priuie Chamber, whoſe names were ſir Richard Wingfield, ſir Richard Jernyngham, ſir Richarde Weſton, and ſir William Kingſton: and diuers officers were chaunged in all places.

Then ſir John Pechy was made deputie of Calice, and ſir Richarde Wingfield thereof diſcharged, and Nicholas Carew made Capitain of Rice banke, and commaunded to go thether, which was ſore to him diſpleaſaunt. Theſe yong minions which was thus ſeuered from the king, had beene in Fraunce, and ſo highly prayſed the French king and his Court, that in a maner they thought little of the king and his Court, in compariſon of the other, they were ſo high in loue with the French Court, wherefore their fall was little moned among wyſe men.

This was Charles the firſt of that name.

This yere in the moneth of June was elected to be Emperour Charles king of Caſtell, and nephew to the Quene, by the whole aſſent of the electors of the Empyre: Although the Frenche king ſent his great Mayſter to cauſe him to be elected to the high maieſty of the Empyre: yet his Ambaſſador and great mayſter of hys houſholde called Gonffier Lord of Boiſy, and brother to William Gonffier Lord Boneuet Admiral of Fraunce, which was Ambaſſador in England the laſt yere as you haue heard, did not ſo his meſſage that it tooke any effect. The king which had ſent Doctor Pace his Secretory for the aduauncement of his nephew the king of Caſtell to the dignitie Emperiall, becauſe he had the Duchy of Oſtrik, and many other ſeignioryes in Almaine, was very ioyous of this election, and cauſed a ſolempne Maſſe to be ſong at Paules the. vij. day of July: at which Maſſe was preſent the Cardinall Campeius, the Cardinall of Yorke, the Duke of Buckingham, of Norffolke, and Suffolke, with the Ambaſſadours of Spaine, Fraunce, Uenice, and Scotland. And after Maſſe was done, the Quiere ſang Te deum, and then all the Lordes departed to Baynardes Caſtell to dinner, and that night were ſolempne fieres made through London, and great plentie of Wine geuen by Italians, Duchemen, and Spanyardes, for theſe newes.

This Sommer the Queene deſired the king to bring to her Manor of Hauering in the Bower of Eſſex, the Gentlemen of Fraunce beyng hoſtages. And for their welcommyng ſhe purueyed all thinges in the moſt liberalleſt maner: and eſpecially ſhe made to the kyng ſuch a ſumptuous banket, that the king thanked her hartily, and the ſtraungers gaue it great prayſe.

The

The king lying there did shote, hunte, and runne dayly with the hostages, to their great ioy.

In the Month of Nouember, the king came from Lambeth to Westminster hall, & so to the starre chamber, & there were before him the Lord Ogle, the Lord Hayward, sir Mathew Browne, sir William Bulmer, & John Scot of Camerwell, for diuers riottes, misdemeanors and offences, and especially the king rebuked Sir Wylliam Bulmer knight, because he beyng the kyngs seruaunt sworne, refused the kings seruice, and became seruaunt to the Duke of Buckingham, saiyng: that hee would none of hys seruauntes should hang on an other mans sleeue, and that he was as well able to maintaine him as the Duke of Buckingham, and that what might be thought by his departing, and what might be supposed by the Dukes retayning, he would not then declare. The knyght kneeled still on hys knees, criyng the king mercie, and neuer a noble man there durst entreate for him, the king was so highly displeased with him. Yet at the last when other matters were heard, the king moued with pittie forgaue the saide syr Wylliam his offence, saiyng, that we wil that none of our seruaunts shall belong to any other person, but to vs, nor we will not that our subiectes repine or grudge at such as we fauour, for our pleasure we will haue in that case as vs lyketh, for one we will fauour nowe, and another at such time as vs shall like: and therefore Sir Wylliam, if you serue vs hartily, you shall not be forgotten, and for this time we pardon you. Likewise he pardoned the lord Edmond Hayward, and Syr Mathewe Browne their offences, which were indicted of ryottes, and maintenaunce of bearinges of diuers misdoers within the Countie of Surrey: but the Lorde Ogle humbly besecked the king of hys mercie, to whome he aunswered. Sir your matter concerneth murther of our subiect, which great offence is not onely to vs but to God, and therfore we remit you to the common lawe. And then he rose and went to his Barge, and by the way he made James Yarfford Maior of the Citie of London knight, and so he with all his counsayle came to Lambeth.

The foure Gentlemen hostages of Fraunce, dayly resorted to the court and had great cheere, and were well entertayned, and euery time they moued, stirred and required the king to passe the Sea, and to meete with the french king their maister, whome they praysed highly, affirming that if the king and he might once familierly common together, that there should such a constaunt loue rise and encrease betweene them, which afterward should neuer faile. This request was oftentimes heard and little regarded, but yet by the meanes of the Cardinall at the last, in the ende of Februarie it was agreed that the king in person should passe the sea to hys Castell and Lordship of Guisnes, and there in Maye next comming betweene Guisnes and Arde, the king and the French king should meete. When thys was fully concluded, the king wrote letters to all suche Lordes, Ladies, Gentlemen, and Gentlewomen as should geue their attendaunce on him and the Queene: which incontinent put themselues in a readynesse, after the most costliest fashion, for the furniture of the same meeting.

Then were sent to Guysnes vnder the rule of syr Edward Belknap three thousand artificers, which buylded out of the earth on the playne before the Castell of Guysnes, the most goodlyest Palace of tymber that euer was wrought in the same place, and so curiously garnished without and within. Beside thys, prouisions were made within the realme of Englande and in Flaunders for vittayle, wyne and all other thinges necessarie for the same. And yet beside all this Orleaunce king at armes in Fraunce came into the Court of Englande and made Proclamation, that the king of England and the French king, in a campe betweene Arde and Guysnes, with.xviij. aydes in June next ensuyng, should abide all comners beyng gentlemen, at the Tylt, at Tozney, and at barriers, and lyke proclamation was made by Clarenseaux king at armes in England, and in the Court of Fraunce, and in the Court of Burgoyne, and in dyuers other Courtes and places in Almaine, and Italye. For furnishing of the Justes, there was deuysed a Tylt, and all things necessarie for that enterprise, in a goodly playne betweene Guysnes and Arde.

During the time of these preparations, newes were brought to the king that Charles his Nephewe elected Emperour of Almayne woulde shortly depart out of Spaine by sea, and come by Englande to go into Germany to receyne hys first Crowne at Acon. Wherfore the king caused great prouisions to be made at euery Hauen, for the receyuing of hys welbeloued Nephew and friend, and daylie prouisions were made on all sides for these noble meetings of so high princes: and especially the Queene of Englande, and the Lady Dowagar of Fraunce, made great cost on the apparell of their Ladies and Gentlewomen.

In this yere the king being informed that his realme of Ireland was out of order, discharged the Erle of Kildare of his office of Deputy and therunto (by the meanes of the Cardinall as men thought) was appointed the Erle of Surrey Lorde Admirall, to whome the Cardinall did not owe the best fauour. Wherefore the sayde Erle of Surrey in the beginning of Aprill tooke leaue of the king, and the Duke of Norffolke his father, and passed into Irelande, and had with him diuers Gentelmen, that had bene in the garrison of Tourney, and one hundred yomen of the kinges gard, and other to the number of a thousand men. Where he by his manhood and wisdome, brought the Erle of Desmond and diuers other rebelles to good conformitie and order: and there he continued in great hardnesse two yere and more, in which space he had many battailes and skirmishes with the wilde Irish.

When it was concluded that the kinges of England and Fraunce should mete, as you haue heard, then both the kings committed the order and maner of their meting, and how many dayes they should mete, and what preheminence eche should geue to other, to the Cardinall of Yorke.

1520 12 The king intending and perseuering in purpose to mete with Fraunces the French king, great and rich prouisions were made, wherfore the noble king and the Queene wyth all the noble Courte, remoued the .xxj. daye of May being on Mondaye, from their Manor of Grenewhich, toward the the Sea side, and so on Fridaye being the .xxv. day of May, arriued at the Citie of Cauntorbury intending there to kepe his Whitsontyde.

Charles Emperour landed in England. Sone after his comming to Cauntorburie, tidinges were brought that Charles Emperour elect, was on the Sea, in sight of the coast of Englande, wherefore officers of the king were sent with great diligence to the Castell and Towne of Douer, to be there in a readinesse against the arriuall of the Empe-Emperour.

The Lord Cardinall, came to the towne of Douer in haſte with a noble repaire, abiding the comming of the Emperour, which Emperour, the Saterday being the .xxvj. day of May arriued with all his nauy of ſhips royall on the coaſte of Kent, direct to the towne or port of Hieth the ſayde daye by noone, where he was hailed by the noble knight ſir William Fitzwilliam, vice Admirall of Englande, with ſix of the kinges ſhippes well furniſhed, which laye for the ſafegarde of paſſage betwene Douer and Calice, at the coſte and charges of the king of England: Calmneſſe of the wether and lacke of winde cauſed that the Emperour might not ſo ſone take land at the port of Douer, as he woulde haue done. Notwithſtanding towardes the euen he departed from his ſhippes, and entered into his boate comming towardes the lande, where in his comming to land: on the ſea the Lorde Wolſay Cardinall and Legate met and receaued him with ſuche reuerence as to ſo noble a Prince appertayned. Thus landed the Emperour Charles, vnder the cloth of hys eſtate of the blacke Egle all ſplayed on riche cloth of Golde. In his retinue with him, were manye noble men, and many fayre Ladies of his blood, as princes and Princeſſes, and one Lady as chiefe to be noted, was the princes of Iuinion with many other Nobles which landed with him in high & ſumptuous maner and great riches in their apparell: great ioye made the people of Englande to ſee the Emperour, and more to ſee the bening maner and mekeneſſe of ſo high a Prince.

When the Emperour had thus taken lande, the Lorde Cardinall was as conduyt to the ſame noble Emperour from the ſhore of Douer vnto the Caſtell there: then were all perſones chered with the beſt that there in the towne might be.

After the departing of the Emperour to the lande from his Nauie, the apparell of euerie ſhip then ſhewed, as Flagges, Banners, Streamers, and Targetes, then the mightie ordynaunce of euery of them brake out by force of fier as though the ſea had brent, marueilous was the noiſe of the gonnes.

The Emperor being thus in the Caſtell of Douer, with haſtie tidinges came to the king where as he was at Cantorbury, who haſted him towards the noble Emperor. And ſo came ridyng early in the morning to ỳ Caſtell of Douer, within which Caſtel the king alighted: the Emperor hering ỳ king to be come, came out of his chamber to meete with the king, and ſo met with him on the ſtaiers or he could come vp: where eche embraced other right louingly: then the king brought the Emperour to his chamber, where as there comming was of gladneſſe.

Done after theſe two noble Princes on the Whitſondaye early in the morning tooke their horſe and roade to the Citie of Cauntorburie, the more to ſolempne the feaſt of Penticoſt, but ſpecially to ſe the Queene of England his Aunt was the intent of the Emperour.

The noble perſonages of the realme of England and the Queene with her beautifull trayne of Ladies receyued and welcommed the ſame Charles elect Emperor, whoſe perſon was by the king conueighed to a faire and pleaſaunt chamber where the ſayde Emperor appareled him right richely. Then the noble retinue of the ſayd Emperor aſwell of Lordes as of Ladies were lodged, aſwell as there might be, with ioy and much gladneſſe, & there in Cauntorburie ſoiorned the Emperor and all his trayne with the king, vntyll the Thurſday in the ſame weeke.

The laſt daye of May being Thurſday, the Emperor tooke leaue of the king and all the Ladies, and gaue great thankes, and ſo roade to Sandwiche, and there tooke his ſhippes, the winde to him was liking, whereby he ſailed into Flaunders.

Then the ſame day, the king of England made ſaile from the port of Douer and with a goodly nauie landed at Calice at the houre of a. xj. of the clock and with him the Queene and Ladies and many Nobles of the realme. And ſo was the king receyued into the Checker and there reſted: great repayre of noble men came to the towne of Calice from the French Court, to ſee the king and to ſalute him, which were of his grace, Princely entertayned.

Mondaye the fourth daye of June the kinges grace with all the nobles and the Queene with her traine of Ladyes as other, remoued from Calice to his Lordſhip royall of Guiſnes, which was ſo Noble and royall a lodgyng as before had not beene ſeene, for it was a Palace: the Palace was quadrant, and euerye quadrant of the ſame Palace was three hundred xxviij. foote long of a ſyſe, which was in compaſſe. xiij. hundreth, and. xij. foote about. This Palace was ſet on ſtages by great cunnyng and ſumptuous worke. At the entryng into the Palace before the Gate, on the plaine greene was buylded a fountaine of enbowed worke, gylte with fyne golde, and Bice, ingrayled wyth anticke workes, the olde God of Wyne called Baccus birlyng the wyne, which by the conduytes in the earth ranne to all people plentiouſly with red, white, and claret wyne, ouer whoſe head was written in letters of Romaine in golde, Faicte bonne chere quy vouldra.

The deſcription of the newe palace made by the king of England at Guynes for the receauing of the french king.

On the other hande or ſyde of the gate, was ſet a piller, which was of auncient Romaine worke, borne with foure Lyons of Golde, the pillers wrapped in wreath of Golde curiouſly wrought and intrayled, and on the ſommet of the ſayd Pyller ſtoode an Image of the blind God Cupide, wyth hys Bowe and arrowes of loue readie by his ſeemyng, to ſtryke the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the ſame palace or place with great and mighty maſonrie by ſight was arched, with a Tower on euery ſyde of the ſame portered by great craft, and imbattelled was the gate and Tower, and in the feneſters, and windowes were Images reſemblyng men of warre redie to caſt great ſtones: Alſo the ſame gate or Tower was ſet with compaſſed Images of auncient Princes, as Hercules, Alexander and other by entrayled worke, richly limned with golde and Albyn colours, and well and warely was made ouer the gate loupes, and enforced with battailmentes, and in the ſame gate a lodge for the Porter: which there appered and other, ſumptuouſly apparayled lyke vnto kinges officers.

By the ſame gate all people paſſed into a large Court fayre and beautifull, for in this Court appered much of the outward beautie of this palace, for from the firſt water table to the rayſyng or reſun pieres, was bay wyndowes on euery ſyde mired with cleere Storyes, curiouſly glaſed, the poſtes or monyelles of euery wyndow was guilt. Thus the outwarde part of the place delighted the eies of the beholders, by reaſon of the ſumptuous worke. Alſo the Tower of the Gate as ſeemed, was builded by great maſonry, and by great engyne of mans wit, for the sundrie countenaunces of euery Image that their appered, some shootyng, some castyng, some readie to strike, and tiring of Gonnes, which shewed very honourably. Also all the sayd quadrants bayes, and edifices, were royally entraled, as farre as vnto the same Court appertayned. And direct agaynst the Gate was deuised a halpas, and at the entry of the stayre was Images of sore and terrible countenances, all armed in curious worke of Argentine. The bay of the same halpas pendant by craft of trymmer, & vnder the trimmer, anticke Images of gold enuyroned with verdour of Olyues cast in compasse, inoustring their countenances towards the enteryng of the palace. The stayre of the sayd halpas was cast of passage by the wentes of broade steppes, so that from the first foote or lowest step, a person myght without payne go vnto the highest place of the same halpas.

On euery hande was there Chamber doores and enterynges into the Chambers of the same Palace, which were long and large and well proporcioned, to receyue light and ayre at pleasure: the roofes of them from place to place, and Chamber to Chamber were siled and couered with cloth of Silke, of the most fayre and quick inuention that before that tyme was sene, for the ground was white engrayled, inbowed and batoned with riche clothes of Silkes knitte, and fret with cuttes and braides and sundrie newe castes, that the same clothes of silke shewed like bullions of fyne burned Golde, and the Roses in lossenges: that the same roofe, was in kindely course, furnished so to mannes sight, that no liuyng creature might but ioy, in the beholdyng thereof, for from the lawe piece of the sayde silyng: which piece was gylte with fyne golde, were worke in paan paled, all the walles to the creast encounteryng the clere storyes, the same creast which was of large depenesse, the worke was antique knottes with bosses cast & wrought with more cunnyng then I can wryte, all which workes and ouerages were gylte: and to set it the more to the glory, the flourishyng Bise was comparable to the rich Amell.

Also to the same Palace was rered a Chapell with two closettes, the Quiere of the sayd Chapell siled with cloth of Golde, and thereon frete ingrayled bent clothes of Silke, all was then Silke and golde. The aulters of this Chapell were hanged with rich reuesture of cloth of golde of Tissue, embroudered with pearles. Ouer the high aultar was hanged a riche Canaby of maruaylous greatnesse, the aultar was apparayled with fiue payre of Candlesticks of golde, and on the aultar an halpas, and thereon stood the Sacrament all of fyne golde, and on the same halpas stood. rij. Images of the bignesse of a childe of foure yeres of age all golde: And all the Copes and Vestimentes so riche as might be prepared or bought in the Citie of Florens, for all the Copes and Vestimentes were but of one peece, so wouen for the purpose, cloth of Tissue and poudered with red Roses purled with fine gold: the Orfreys set with pearles and precious stones. And all the walles and deskes of this Chapell were hanged with right cloth of golde, and three rich great Crosses were there readie to be borne at festiuall tymes, and Basyns, and Sensers, Gospellers, Paxes, Crewets, holy water vesselles, and other ornamentes all of golde.

Also in the first Closet was a trauerse for the kinges person of cloth of Golde: And within that the Kinges place and Chaire, with Cushins of cloth of Golde: before the trauerse was an altare of presence, which altare was adourned with cloth of brouderie and riche Pearles and precious stones, set in Goldsmithes worke of fine Golde. On the aultar was a deske or halfpace, whereon stood a Crucifix of fine Golde, with an Image of the Trinitie, an Image of our Lady, and twelue other Images all of fine Gold and precious stones, two payre of Candelsticks of fine Gold, with Basens, Crewettes, Pares, and other Ornamentes: the sayde Closet was hanged wyth Tappets embrawdered with riche worke, fret with pearles & stones, the rooffe of the same Closet was sieled with worke of Inmouled, guilt with fine Golde and Senapar and Bice.

The second Closet was for the Quenes person, the which was as well trimmed and bewtified as the other Closet was.

And from this palace or place into the mightie and strong fortresse and Castell royall of Guisnes, was a Galerie for the secret passage of the kings person into a secret lodging within the same castell, the more for the kinges ease. And finally to this palace was ioyned all houses of offices, that to such an honorable court should appertaine. In this palace as ye haue heard, was the kings grace lodged and all the nobles after their degrees. And for that the towne of Guysnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they set vp tentes in the field, to the number of twentie and eyght hundred sundrie lodgings, which was a goodly sight. Thus was the king in his Palace royall at Guysnes.

Fraunces the French king was with all his Nobles of the realme of Fraunce, come to the towne of Arde, where was prepared for his comming, many tentes, hales and paulions, & the same were set and pight in the field. On the French partie also, there was at the same towne of Arde buylded the French kings lodging full well, but not finished, much was the prouision in Picardie on euerye part through all. The French king commaunded his lodging to be made, a little out of the towne of Arde in the territorie of an olde castle, which by the warre of olde time had bene beaten. On the same place was reedified a house of solace and sport, of large & mightie compasse, which was chiefely sustayned by a great mightie maste, whereby the great ropes and takell strayned, the same mast was stayd. All the rooffe of the same house hong on the same maste, and with takell was strayned and borne, by the supporters of the same maste or tree, the colours of the same was all blewe, set with starres of Golde foyle, and the Orbes of the heauens by the craft of colours in the rooffe, were curiously wrought in maner like the skie, or firmament, and a cressant strayned sumdeale towards the towne of Arde, this cressant was couered with frets and knottes made of Iuie Bushes, and bore braunches and other things that longest would be greene for pleasure.

In thys time Lorde Thomas Wolsay Cardinall and Legate a Latere as the kings high Imbassadour rode with noble repaire of Lordes, Gentlemen and Prelates to the towne of Arde, to the French court where of the french king, the same Lord Cardinal was highly entertayned. Of the nobleneſſe of this Cardinal, the frenchmen made bokes, shewing the tryumphant doings of the Cardinals royalty. The number (as they write) of the Gentlemen, knightes and Lordes, all in crimosyn Veluet, with the marueylous number of chaines of Golde, the great horse, Mules, coursers, and cariages, ges, that there were, which went before the Cardinals comming into Arde with sumpters & Cofers. Of his great crosses and pillers borne, the Pillow bere or case broudered, the two Mantels, with other the Ceremoniall offices, with a great and honorable number of bishops geuing their attendance, the mightie and great number of seruauntes, as yomen, gromes, all clothed in Scarlet, who so readeth of the French booke, shall finde the same wonderfully set forth.

The king of England beyng at the Castell of Guisnes in the newe palace, many noble men of the French court resorted to his grace, to see hym and the Queene, and to salute them: who of the king were wel enterteyned

When the Lorde Cardinall had sojourned at Arde in the French court by the space of two dayes, and the high and vrgent princely causes in counsaile declared, the Lorde Cardinall tooke his leaue of the French king, and of all the French court, and repaired vnto the Castell of Guysnes, where he founde the king of Englande his souereigne Lorde. And the same king by his letters patents, had geuen full power and authoritie to the same Lord Cardinall, concerning all matters to be debated, touchyng the king and the realme, and also gaue vnto the same Cardinall, full strength, power, and authoritie, to affirme and confirme, binde and vnbinde, whatsoeuer should be in question, betweene him and the French king, as though the king in proper person had bene there presently.

When the Lordes of the French counsayle, sawe the high and great authoritie that the Cardinall had, they shewed it vnto the French king, who incontinent commaunded his commission to be made, of lyke power and authoritie, that the king of Englande had geuen vnto the sayde Lorde Cardinall: the same power and authoritie had the sayd Cardinall, geuen to him by Fraunces the french king, and affirmed by the counsail roiall of Fraunce. Then hastily was sent to the king of Englande the French kings patent, for the Lorde Cardinall sayd humbly to the French king, that he would no such power receyue, without the consent of the king of Englande his souereigne Lord: but when the king of England and his counsayle had sene and vewed the french kings patent, and it well considered, then he sent the same patent of power to the Lorde Cardinall with full assent: then the Lorde Cardinall the power receyued with much gladnesse. It was highly esteemed and taken for great loue that the french king had geuen so great power to the king of Englandes subiect.

The great credits and authoritie that was committed to Cardinall Wolsey both by the king of Englande and ye french king.

Thursday the seuenth day of June, in the Vale of Andzen, within the Lordship royall of Guysnes, before daye, was set and pight a royall riche Tent, all of cloth of Golde, and riche embroudery of the king of Englands, and dyuers other hales and pauilions: the same riche Tent of Golde, was within hanged of the richest Arras, newly contriued and made, that euer before was seene, and a presence of the kinges estate, with two Chayres and riche Cushyns therein: the ground was spred with Carpets of new Turkey making all full of bewtie.

At the houre of meeting appoynted, the Lordes of Englande set their people and seruaunts in good array of battayle, in a playne field directly before the Castell of Guysnes. The king of Englande commaunded that hys Garde should be set in the brest of the battayle, or bend of footemen and so it was done. This battaile of footemen conducted themselues so in order, that from the first to the last, neuer a person of the fotemen brake his place or array, but kept themselues so well, that neuer seruingmen themselues better demeaned. The seruingmen thus set in order in the field, on the left hand of the king of England, somewhat toward ỳ Marres, long while thus abiding, in which time the castel of Guisnes shot a warning peece to ỳ towne of Arde, and in lykewise the towne of Arde gaue warning to the castell of Guysnes.

The meteyng and encounter of the king of England and the French king.

And forthwith the king of Englande with all the court of the nobles of the realme mounted on horseback, and marched towardes the Valey of Andern in honorable order, all gentle men, Squiers, Knightes, and Barons, roade before the king and Bythops also, the Dukes, Marques and Erles, gaue attendaunce next the king.

The French king on his partie marched towarde the encounter wyth all the ruffelers and gallantes of the French Court. In which time came to the Frenche king some report, that caused him to tarry, and a light from hys horse, then the French men were very doubtfull, and in a staye so still rested, vntill a Lorde of Fraunce called Mounsire Morret, the sayde Morret came to the French king, and shewed him the verie fidelitie of the king of Englande, wherby the French king mounted on horseback, and the better encouraged, marched towards the place appoynted of encounter.

Thus in marchyng the one king to the other, to the king of England came Lorde George Neuell Lorde Aburgheny, and openly sayde, sir ye be my king and souereigne, wherefore aboue all I am bounden to shewe you truth, and not to let for none, I haue bene in the French partie, and they be mo in number, double so many, as ye be: with that was ỳ Erle of Shrewsburie Lorde Steward readie and sayde, syr whatsoeuer my Lorde of Burgheny sayth, I my selfe haue bene there, and the Frenchmen be more in feare of you and your subiects, then your subiects be of them: wherefore sayde the Erle, if I were worthie to geue counsayle, your grace should marche forwarde, so we intende my Lorde sayde the king: then the officers of armes cryed on afore, then in short whyle was the king on the banke of Anderne: then euery gentleman as they roade tooke his place, and stoode still side by side, theyr regarde or face towardes the Vale of Andern.

Then the king of England shewed himself somedeale forward in bewty & personage, the most goodliest prince ỳ euer reigned ouer the realme of England: his grace was apparelled in a garment of cloth of siluer of Damaske, ribbed with cloth of Golde, so thicke as might be, the garment was large, and plited verie thick, and canteled of verye good intaile, of suche shape and making, ỳ it was marueilous to behold. The courser which his grace roade vpō, was trapped in a marueilous vesture of a new deuised fashion, the trapper was of fine Golde in Bullion, curiously wrought, pounced and set with antique worke of Romaine Figures. Attending on the kings grace of Englande, was the maister of his horse, by name syr Henry Guylford, leading the kinges spare horse, the which horse was trapped in a Mantellet brent and back place, all of fine Golde in Scifers, of deuise with tasselles on cordels pendaunt, the Saddell was of the same sute and worke, so was the Hedstall and raynes. After folowed .iv. henxmen, ryding on Coursers of Naples the same yong Gentlemen were appareled in riche cloth of Tissue, the coursers in harneſſe of maruaylous faſhion, ſcaled in fine Golde in Bullion, and all the ſame horſe harneſſe were ſet full of trembling ſpangles that were large and faire. The Lorde Marques Dorſet bare the kings ſworde of eſtate before the kings grace, the Lorde Cardinall did his attendaunce.

Thus in little time, abidyng the comming of the French king and his, the which in ſhort time came with a great number of horſemen, freſhly appareled, the French king and his retaine, put themſelues in place appoynted, direct againſt the Engliſhe partie, beholding euery other of both nations, the French men muſed muche of the battayle of the footemen, and euerye of the French men to other ſpake of the multitude of the Engliſhe men which ſeemed great, yet were not they ſo many as the French partie.

When the French king had a little beholden the Engliſhe men, he put himſelfe ſomewhat before his people, that were there on him attendaunt, the Duke of Burbon bearing a naked ſworde vpright, the Lorde Admirall of Fraunce, & the Countie Coſmen Galias, Maiſter of the french kings horſe, and no mo perſons gaue their attendance in paſſing with the Frenche king: when it was perceyued that the french kings ſworde was borne naked, then the king of England commaunded the Lorde Marques Dorſet to draw out the ſword of eſtate, and beare it vp naked in the preſence, which was ſo done.

Then vp blewe the Trumpets, Shagbuttes, Clarions, and all other Minſtrels on both ſides, and the kinges diſcended downe towarde the bottome of the valey of Andern, in ſight of both the nations and on horſeback, met and embraced the two kings eche other: then the two kinges alighted, and after embraſed with benyng and curteous maner eche to other, with ſweete and goodly wordes of greeting: and after fewe wordes, theſe two noble kinges went together into a riche Tent of cloth of Golde, that there was ſet on the grounde for ſuch purpoſe: thus arme in arme went the french king Fraunces the firſt of Fraunce, and Henry the eyght king of England and of Fraunce, together paſſyng with communication.

When theſe two princes were in the Tent before rehearſed, the french king ſayde, my deare brother and Coſyn, thus farre to my paine haue I trauayled to ſee you perſonally, I thinke verily that you eſteeme me as I am. And that I maye to you be your ayde, the realmes and ſeigniories ſhewe the might of my perſon: Sir ſaid the king of England, neither your realmes nor other the places of your power, is the matter of my regard, but the ſtedfaſtneſſe and loyall keeping of promiſe, compriſed in Charters betwene you and me: that obſerued and kept, I neuer ſawe Prince with my eyen, that might of my hart be more loued. And for your loue I haue paſſed the ſeas, into the fardeſt frontier of my realme to ſee you preſently, the which doing now gladdeth mee. And then were the two kings ſerued with a banket, and after mirth, had communication in the banket time, and there ſhewed the one the other their pleaſure.

After the two kings had ended the banket, they came forth in open ſight and there departed with their companie, the king of Englande to Guyſnes, the French king to Arde. And ſundrie dayes were kept ſundrie and royall Juſtes and other paſtimes: the perticulers whereof I omit becauſe mention is before made of ſundrie of them.

Mondaye the .xj. daye of June, the two Queenes of England and of Fraunce

The meting of both the Queenes of England and France.

Fraunce came to the Campe, where eyther saluted other right honorably, and went into a stage for them prepared, right curiously hanged, and specially there was for the Queene of England, a Tapet all of pearle called Huges Dike, which was much loked at for the costlynesse of the same.

Gifres geuen by the french king and the king of Englande.

And after sundry metinges of the sayde two kinges many dayes, and sundry great feastes and banquets, that the one king had made to the other. They in the ende gaue vnto eche other sundry rich and costly gifres and Jewels, as first. The king of England gaue to the French king a Collor of Jewels of precious stones, called Balastes, the Sanker, furnished with great Diamantes and Perles. The French king gaue to the king of England a Bracelet of precious stones, riche Jewels and fayre, and so departed the sayde two noble kinges, the sayde .xxiiij. daye of June, which was Sonday and Midsomerday.

During thys triumph so muche people of Picardie and West Flaunders drew to Guysnes to se the king of Englande and his honor, to whome vittailes of the court were in plentie, the Condette by the gate ranne wyne alwayes, there were Vagaboundes, Plowmen, Labozers and of the Bragarie, Wagoners and Beggers that for drunkennesse lay in routes & heaps, so great resort thither came, that both knights and Ladies that were come to see the nobleneſſe, were fayne to lye in haye and strawe, and helde them therof highly pleased. From the court of the Emperor, nor of the Lady Margaretes court, nor of Flaunders, Brabant, nor Burgoyne, came neuer a person to aunswer to the chalenge: By that it seemed that there was small loue betwene the Emperor and the French king: Moreouer Mounsire Fayot Capitaine of Bullein with Mounsire Chattelon did their deuoire to haue taken the towne of saint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodnesse to the Emperour.

I meting concluded to be had in England betweene the Emperour and king Henry.

Monday the .xxv. daye of June, the king of Englande and the Queene and all the courte remoued from Guysnes to the towne of Calice and there made the king his abode, where was concluded the meetyng of the Emperor with the king, wherefore was made newe and great prouisions.

In the time of the triumph there was a muttering that the towne of Calice should be rendered into the French kings hands, & for truth the Frenchmen so spake and sayde, wherewith many Englishmen were grieued.

King Henry dischargeth a great part of his traine.

While the king laye thus in Calice he considered the charge of his nobles, and thought that lesse number of seruauntes would now serue them for the time of his abode, and so caused the Cardinall to call al the Gentelmen before him which in the kinges name gaue to them thankes with much commendations, and for eschewyng of cost, because the king taried but the Emperours comming, he licensed them to sende home the halfe number of their seruaunts and bade them after their long charges to liue warely, this terme warely was amongst the most parte taken for barely, at which saiyng the Gentelmen sore disdayned.

The king rydeth to Graueling to visit the Emperor.

Thus in Calice rested the king and the Queene vntill the tenth daye of July. Then the kinges grace with goodly repaire roade to the towne of Graueling in Flaunders there that night to rest and see the Emperour, on the king were waighting the Lorde Cardinall, Dukes, Marquises, Erles, Bishops, Barons, Knightes, and Gentelmen. The noble Emperor passed the water of Graueling, and at a place called Waell, there he met and receyued the king of England, the Emperor made such semblant of loue to all the court of Englande that he wan the loue of the Englishmen, and so passed the Emperor and the king of England to Graueling, where the king lodged the best that might be, all Lordes, Gentelmen, yomen and all sortes of Englishmen from the highest to the lowest were so chered and feasted, with so louing manner that much they prayse the Emperors court. In Graueling was the Emperors Aunt Margaret, she welcomed the king and other noble men of the realme.

When the French king and his Lordes had knowledge of the metinß of the Emperor and the king of Englande in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatly grieued, as by many thinges appered, for after the Englishmen were in Fraunce disdayned, and in their suites there greatly deferred and had litle right and much lesse fauor, so from day to day still more and more began hart brenning, and in conclusion open warre did arise betweene the two realmes.

Wednesday the. xj. day of July, the Emperor and the Lady Margaret came with the king of England to the towne of Calice, the Emperor and the Lady Margaret were lodged in Staple hall, and all Gentelmen and other lodged in other places right wel prepared of all necessaries for their cõming: and for solas was builded a banqueting house. lxxx. foote round, after a goodly deuise, builded vpon Masles of chippes in such maner as I thinke was neuer seene, for in it was the whole spere portrated, which by reason of the great wind that blewe, could not be achieued, the same day at night were sondry riche Masques and goodly shewes both of noble men and of Ladies.

The Emperour cõmeth to Calice.

Tewsday the. xij. day of July, because the banquet house coulde not be finished, the Emperor and the Ladye Margaret supped with the king and the Queene at the Checker, where the same night after Supper reuelled lxxxvj. Masquers: after the reuels was a banquet: After which banquet the king brought the Emperor and the Lady Margaret to the Staple, and after withdrew him.

Fryday the. xiij. day of July, the Emperor did intende to haue departed from Calice, but the counsaile was such that he departed not that night. The charters before time concluded, there were redde, and to the Emperor declared all the whole articles of high peace and league tripertite, to which the French king had assented and fully contented, and for the more exemplification of the same, he sent the Lorde de Roche with letters of credence to signifie to the Emperors Maiestye that to the same articles he the French kyng promised in the worde of a king as Prince faythfull, to obserue and kepe for him and his realme and Subiectes. Thus by the Lorde de Roche in the Emperors presence and before the king of England in the name of his maister, their shewed the French kinges will in the towne of Calice with many high and vrgent causes concerning the Princes, whereby the Emperor went not out of Calice that night, by which aboad the Emperors Seruantes were much in doubt of the Emperors person.

Saterday the. xiiij. day of July, about noone the Emperour toke leaue of thee Queene of England his Aunte and of her traine of Ladyes, the king with all his nobles conducted the Emperor on his way to a village towards Flaunders called Waell, where the Emperour embraced the king, and him betooke to almightie God, and the king gaue to him a Courser of Naples richely apparayled.

The returne of the king into Englande.

The king tooke leaue of the Duchesse of Sauoy great aunt to the Emperour, and of all Nobles of the Emperors Court, and so departed, final tyme in Calice the king abode, but in goodly hast shipped, & with the Queene and all other Nobles in safetie tooke lande. And after passed the tyme of Sommer with huntyng and other spoztes honourably, and made no great feastes this yere.

This yere the king kept his Christmasse at his Manor of Grenewich with much noblenesse and open Court. And the.x. day of Febzuary in hys awne person Justed to all commers, and the.xij. day his grace and the Erle of Deuonshire with foure aydes aunswered at the Tournay all commers which were.xbj. persons, noble and riche was their apparell, but in feates of armes the king excelled the rest.

The duke of Buckingham accused.

In this tyme was Edward Duke of Buckyngham accused to the king of high treason, wherefore the kinges grace by the aduyce of his counsaile, sent and directed his letters to the said Duke, being at his Manor of Thornbury in the Countie of Gloucester, that incontinent he shoulde come to hys presence all excuses layde aside. Also the king gaue commaundement to sir William Compton, sir Richard Weston, and syr Wylliam Kingston knights for the kinges bodie, to take with them secret power and also Sergeaunts at armes, and that they should wisely take hede that while the Duke receiued the kings letters, he should not conuey himself, which they wisely accomplished.

The sayde Duke vpon the sight of the kinges letters remoued, and so iourneyed till he came to Windsore, and there offered at Saint George, and alwayes not farre from him awaityng his demeanor, were the same knights lyng. The Duke lodged in Windsore for that night, and as it was well proued, he meruaylously feared, insomuch that he called vnto him a seruaunt of the kinges named Thomas Warde, the same Thomas Warde was gentleman Harbenger for the king, and demaunded of him what he made there, who aunswered saiyng, that there lay his office, there the Duke perceyued that he could not escape. And so much was he in spirite troubled, that as he was at breakefast, his meate would not downe, yet he made good countenaunce, and shortly tooke his horse, and so road til he came to Tothill besides Westminster where he tooke his Barge: before this time was the Dukes Chauncelor taken and as a prisoner kept in the Tower, which had confessed matter of high treason concernyng the kinges person.

When the Duke was in his Barge, he commaunded to land at my Lord Cardinalles bridge, where he landed with foure or fiue of his seruaunts, desiryng to see the same Lord Cardinall, but he was aunswered howe the same Lord was diseased, well sayd the Duke, yet will I drink of my Lordes wine or I passe, then a Gentleman of my Lords brought the Duke with much reuerence into the Seller, where the Duke dranke.

When he saw & perceyued no chere to him was made, he chaunged colour and so departed to his Barge, saiyng to his seruaunts, I marual where my Chauncelor is, that he cōmeth not to me, not knowyng that he was in prison.

The Duke thus in his Barge commyng towardes London, sir Henry

Marney

Marney Capitaine of the kinges Garde, on him attendyng an hundred yomen of the kinges garde in a Barge on the ryuer of Thames met the same Duke, and without abode bozded the Dukes Barge, and him in the kings name attached. And then from him were put his seruauntes, and the Duke was bzought to the Hay wharfe, and there landed, the Dukes seruauntes were commaunded to go to the Manoz of the Rose in Saint Laurence pountnay, and there to abide till the kinges pleasure were further knowen.

The Duke of Buckingham attached of treason, and bzought to the Tower.

Sir Henry Marney bzought the Duke thzough Thames streete to the Tower of London, the people much mused what the cause might be, and foz troth till it was knowen, among them was much speakyng. There was also attached a Monke of a Charterhouse besydes Bzistow called Henton, also Mayster John Delaker the Dukes Contesloz, and the Dukes Chauncelor before mencioned, all were in the Tower pzisoners. The.xvj.day of Apzill was the same Duke bzought to the Tower. Alas the while that euer ambicion should be the losse of so noble a man, and so much in the kings fauour, by him all the Lozdes and other may beware how they geue credence to false propheries oz false hipocrites. Foz a Monk of the Charterhouse shewed the duke that he should be king of England, which to ỹ kings person could be no higher treason. Alas that euer he gaue credence to such a false Traytour.

In this tyme inquirys were made in dyuers shires of Edward Duke of Buckyngham beyng pzisoner in the Tower of London, where by the knightes and Gentlemen, there he was endited of high treason foz certaine wozdes spoken by the same Duke in Blechyngly to the Lozde Aburgany, and the same Lozde was attached foz consailment, and so was the Lozde Mountague the kinges Cosyn, and both ledde to the Tower. And sir Edwarde Neuell knight, bzother to the sayde Lozde Aburganey fozbidden the kinges pzesence. 1521 13

The Duke of Nozffolke was made by the kinges letters patentes high Steward of England, to accomplish the high cause of appele of the Piere oz Pieres of the realme, and to decerne and iudge the causes of the Pieres. &c.

Wherefoze shozily after was made in Westminster hall a Scaffolde foz the Lozdes, and a pzesence foz a Judge, rayled, and counter rayled about, and barred with degrees. The Duke of Nozffolke was chiefe Judge, and many Pieres of the realme, as the Duke of Suffolk, the Marques Dozset, the Erles of Wozcester, Deuonshire, Esser, Shzewsbury, Kent, Orfozde, and Darby, the Lozde of Saint Johns, Lozd Delaware, Lozd Fitzwarren, Lozd Willoughby, Lozd Bzoke, Lozd Cobham, Lozd Harbert, and the Lozd Mozley, sat as Pieres and Judges vpon the same Duke of Buckyngham. The arraignment of the Duke of Buckingham.

When the Lozdes had taken their places, sir Thomas Louell, and sir Richard Chomley knightes, bzought the Duke to the barre with the Axe of the Tower before him, who humbly bare hedded reuerenced the Duke of Nozffolke, and after all the Lozdes and the kinges learned Counsaile. Then the Clerke of the counsaile sayde, sir Edward Duke of Buckingham, holde vp thy hande, thou art indited of high treason, foz that thou trayterously hast conspired and imagined as farre as in thee lay to shozten the life of our souereigne Lozde the king: of this treason how wilt thou acquite thee, the Duke aunswered by my Pieres.

And when the enditement was openly reade, the Duke sayd it is false and vntrue, and conſpired and forged, to bring me to my death, and that will I proue, alleagyng many reaſons to falſifie the inditement, and agaynſt hys reaſons the kinges Atturnay alleged the examinations, confeſſions, and proofes of witneſſes.

The Duke deſired the witneſſes to be brought forth, then was brought before him ſir Gilbert Perke prieſt his Chauncelor, firſt accuſer of the ſame Duke, Maiſter John Delacourt prieſt, the Dukes confeſſor, and his awne hande writyng layde before him to the accuſement of the Duke. Charles Kniuet Eſquier, Coſyn to the Duke, and a Monke, Prior of the Charterhouſe beſydes Bath, which like a falſe ypocrite had enduced the Duke to the treaſon, and had dyuers tymes ſayde to the Duke, that he ſhould be king of England, but the Duke ſayd, that in himſelfe he neuer conſented to it. Diuers preſumptions and accuſements were layde to him by Charles Kniuet, which he would faine haue couered. The depoſitions were read, and the deponentes were deliuered as priſoners to the officers of the Tower.

Then ſpake the Duke of Norffolke, and ſayde my Lord, the king our ſouereigne Lorde hath commaunded that you ſhall haue his lawes miniſtred with fauour and right to you: Wherefore if you haue any other thing to ſay for your ſelfe, you ſhall be heard. Then he was commaunded to withdrawe him, and ſo was led into Paradiſe a houſe ſo named. The Lordes went to counſaile a great while and after tooke theyr places. Then ſayde the Duke of Norffolke to the Duke of Suffolke, what ſay you of Sir Edward Duke of Buckyngham touchyng the high treaſons that he hath bene arraigned of? the Duke of Suffolke anſwered, he is gylty, and ſo ſayde the Marques, and all the other Erles and Lordes: Thus was this Prince Duke of Buckingham found giltie of highe treaſon by a Duke, a Marques, ſeuen Erles, and. xij. Barons.

The Duke was brought to the barre fore chafyng and ſweat meruelouſly, after he had made his reuerence, he paused a while. The Duke of Norffolke as a Judge ſayde, ſir Edward, you haue heard howe you be indited of high treaſon, you pleaded thereto not giltie, puttyng your ſelfe to the Peres of the realme, the which haue found you giltie: then the Duke of Norffolke wept and ſayde, you ſhall be led to the kinges priſon and there layd on a Hardell, and ſo drawen to the place of execution, and there to be hanged, cut downe alyue, your members to be cut off & caſt into the fyre, your bowels brent before you, your head ſmitten of, and your body quartered and deuided at the kinges will, and God haue mercy on your ſoule. Amen.

The duke of Buckinghās iudgement.

The Duke of Buckingham ſayde, my Lorde of Norffolke, you haue ſayd as a traytor ſhould be ſayd vnto, but I was neuer none, but my Lordes I nothing maligne for that you haue done to me, but the eternall God forgeue you my death and I do: I will neuer ſue to the king for lyfe, howbeit he is a gracious Prince, and more grace may come from him then I deſyre. I deſyre you my Lordes and all my felowes to pray for me.

Then was the edge of the Axe turned towardes him, and ſo led into a Barge, ſir Thomas Louell deſired him to ſit on the Cuſhyns and Carpet ordayned for him, he ſayde nay, for when I went to Weſtminſter, I was Duke of Buckingham, now I am but Edward Bohehen the moſt caitiffe of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where receyued him ſir Nicholas cholas Harpe, and ſir William Sandes Baronets, and led him through the Citie, who deſyred euer the people to pray for him, of whome ſome wept and lamented, and ſayd this is the ende of euill lyfe. God forgeue him, he was a prowde Prince, it is pitie that he behaued him ſo againſt his king and liege Lord, whom God preſerue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a caſt man to the Tower.

Fryday the. xvij. day of May, about .xj. of the Clocke. This Duke with a great power was deliuered to John Kyeme, and John Skeuington ſhirifes, who led him to the Skaffolde on Tower hill, where he ſayde he had offended the kinges grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and deſired all noble men to beware by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he truſted to die the kinges true man. Thus meekely with an Ave he tooke his death. Then the Auguſtyne Friers tooke the bodie and head, and buryed them.

The Duke of Buckingham beheded.

About this tyme Fraunces the French king made open warre againſt the Emperour Charles both by land and ſea. The Prouinces of Arragon, Caſtell, and all Spaine, Germany, Brabant, Flaunders, and the ſteades mayntayned the partie of the Emperor. The kinges highneſſe conſideryng the murder and effuſion of Chriſten blood, and the trouble that might enſue to all princes of Chriſtendome, by inuaſion of the great Turke, ſent the Cardinall of Yorke his Chauncelor by name Thomas Wolſey to his towne of Calice to intreate an amitie & peace betwene thoſe two mighty princes. For this voyage great preparation was made, not onely for the Cardinall, but alſo for the Erle of Worceſter then Lord Chamberleyn, the Lord of Saint Johns, the Lord Ferrers, the Lorde Harbert, the Biſhop of Dureſme, the Biſhop of Ely, the Primate of Armicane, ſir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Peche, ſir John Huſſey, ſir Richard Wingfielde, ſir Henry Guylforde, and many other Knightes, Eſquiers, Gentlemen, Doctors, and learned men that accompanied him. And thus honourably accompanied he rode through London the. xxv. day of July, and at Thomas. Beckets Church the Maior and Aldermen tooke leaue of him, praying God to ſende him good ſpeede. Thus paſſed he to Cauntorbury where the Archbiſhoppe, of Cauntorbury, and other Prelates receyued him in pontificalibus and brought him to his lodgyng vnder a Canapie to the Biſhops palace. The. viij. day of July he came to Douer: the. xx. daye, he and the other Lordes with their retinues tooke paſſage, and arriued at Calice in ſafety, where the Lorde Deputie and the Counſaile receyued them with much honor, and lodged the Cardinall in the Staple hall.

The French king maketh open warre vpon the Emperor.

Shortly after whoſe arriuall, came thether the Chauncelour of Fraunce and the Countie de Palays with foure hundred horſe, as Ambaſſadors from the French king, and lykewiſe from the Emperor came great Ambaſſadors and when they ſate in counſayle, the Emperours Ambaſſade ſhewed their commiſſion and power. And euen ſo did the French kings Ambaſſade, which was more larger then the Emperours commiſſion.

Thus when the grudges were declared on both ſides, when the Emperors Ambaſſadors conſented to peace, the French kings would not. And when the french Ambaſſadors conſented to peace, the Emperors would not. The Cardinal then would haue knitted the Emperour, the king our ſoue-raigne Lorde, the frenche king, and the Bysshop of Rome in a league and amitie together: the other Ambassadors had no such commission, especially the Bysshop of Romes, wherevpon letters were sent to Rome in all haste, and the Frenchmen tarved in Calice, till he returned and beheld the towne, with which the counsayle of Calice were not contented. Herevpon the Cardinall rode to the Emperor accompanied with his Ambassadors (and left the frenche Imbassadors in Calice to abide his returne) and passed by Graueling, Dunkirke, Newport, Owdenborow, and sundry times in the waye he was encountered and receyued with noble men. And without Bruges he was receyued with many noble men, and manye Lordes and other of the Emperors court, and a myle without Bruges the Emperor his awne person met him, and shewed to him and to the other Lordes and Gentlemen of England gracious countenaunce, and so accompanied the Cardinall into the towne, where great multitude of people beheld them, and so rode to the Emperours palace where he lyghted, and first embraced the Cardinall, and after all the Lords, knights and Gentlemen of England. It is to suppose the Emperour knewe of the commission geuen to the sayde Cardinall, which had the kings power as if his grace had beene present, and also had the great seale with him, which had not bene sene before, or else the Emperour would not haue done him so high honor and reuerence.

Cardinall Wolsey caried the great seale with him out of England.

The Englishe Lordes, knightes, Esquiers, yomen of the kings Garde and other beyng to the number of foure hundred and three score horse, were well lodged euery man after his degree, and euery lodging furnished with fewell, Bread, Bere, Wyne, Beeues, Muttons, Veles, Lambes, Venison, and all maner of daintie viand, as well in fishe as flesshe, with no lacke of spices and banketting dishes.

The next day after the great cheere made to the Lord Cardinall and to all his Lordes, knightes, gentlemen, and all other Lordes and knightes of England (in whose presence) the Cardinall made his proposition concerning peace to be had betwene the sayd Emperour and the French king declaring the calamities, miserie, and wretchednesse that came by warre: and the commodities, benefite, and welth that came by peace, concorde and tranquilitie, which proposition continued a great whyle: and when the Cardinall had made an ende, the Emperour himselfe answered and sayde: The lawe of God byndeth euery man to clayme and aske his right, and that the same law byndeth no man to holde, keepe, and withstande another mans right. Our Cosyn of Fraunce doth withholde our rightes and patrimonies, which we haue princely desired, and eftsones will, and if he will render to vs our sayde rightes and patrimonies, we are contented to haue peace with him and hys subiectes, if not, we trust in God & our right that the troubles by your fatherhed rehersed, shal come vpon him and his adherents. And for the titles of our regalitie, to put that to the Bysshop of Rome, we doe consider that king Edward of England the thirde of that name of noble memorie, warred by iust tytle to recouer the realme of Fraunce from Philip de Valois, which title by intercession was put to the Bysshop of Rome and his Court to discusse, and expended there by the space of twentie and three yeres vndetermined, notwithstanding great pursute and labor was made to haue it ended: Such lyke time should be to vs tedious, wherfore we entend by the ayde of God to

The Cardinall replyed and declared the league that was betwene the three mightiest princes of the worlde, that is to say, the Emperour, the king oure souereigne Lorde Henry the eyght, and the Frenche king, and howe that to the Prince that first mooued warre, the other two should be enemyes vnto hym, and sayde, beholde the mightie power and puyssaunt realme, riches, shippes, vytayles, and ordynaunce, Lordes, chiualrie, horsemen, archers, and communaltie, this is in the high and mightie king of Englande my souereigne Lorde, and he that first warre begynneth, by the sayde league my sayde souereigne Lorde to his honour maye lawfully spred hys Banner, and make warre in defence of hys friende. For thys and other thinges my souereigne Lorde desires of your highnesse and Maiestie the consent of peace.

My Lorde Cardinall, sayde the Emperour, I esteeme most the honor of my dere Uncle the king of Englande and trust in hys assuraunce, that neither his royall person, his realme, his power, Naue, nor ordinaunce shall be but to our ayde in assisting in our tryed tytle, nor will consent to any thing in dishonouring vs or our Empire: God defende but we should humble our selfe to his request, our high honor reserued. Lorde God who may esteeme more higher iniuries and wrongs then we in our person, our predecessours, and our louing subiectes haue endured by the house of Fraunce. My Lord Cardinall sayde the Emperour, their pride with our honor we may and must reprehende and ouerthrowe by the helpe of God: with these wordes the counsayle brake vp.

All the Lordes and men of honour of Englande that day dyned in the Emperours Court.

When they were set and serued, it came to passe that an honorable man of the Emperors as he sat at dinner sayd thus. It is thought that the kinges Maiestie of Englande entendeth to make a peace. Alas that euer he shoulde imagine a thing so much to the dishonor of the Emperor. The king is his Uncle, is it not come to his heering that all the world heareth? It was so that by the assent of the Bishop of Rome and other Princes to make peace with vs, the French partie after the battaile of Gyngate obtayned by Maximilian then Archeduke of Osteriche, where euerie noble man of vs fought with the Frenchmen quarter naked, and slew of them a maruelous number. They desyred the daughter of Maximilian named Margaret to wife, which Lady is Duches of Sauoy and yet liuing, and she being like an Emperors childe was deliuered into their hands as Queene of the realme, with diuers townes in Picardie rendred with her and part of highe Burgonie, and treasure maruelous. Now sithen the same Maximilian had spoused Jane daughter and heire of Fraunces Duke of Britaine, which lande the Frenchmen ouer ranne and spoyled, and she constrained to sue vnto Charles king of Fraunce for a safeconduict to passe through his realme to Maximilian her spouse, and vpon the same safe conduict graunted, the sayd Ladye Jane passing through Fraunce with a small company, was by the same Charles taken at Amboys, and there maried her agaynst her will, wherupon he forsoke the Lady Margaret and sent her againe to her father the Emperor without redyliuery or rendring again the townes that were deliuered wyth her. And where as the Duke of Gelder is subiect to the Emperor, is he not yet at this day by the procurement of the French king, rebell? And where also by iust title the realme of Naples ought to be united to the crowne of Castell, did not the French king fayne a iournay into the holy lande pretending title by Jeniamy brother to the great Turke being then Captiue in Rome, and by a craftie treatie obtayned the said Jeniamy, and so passed into Naples without perill, and seazed all the lande into his handes, and then prisoned he the same Jeniamy? Thus to the great dammage of Castell, he made clayme to Naples by Margaret Queene of Englande late wife to Henrie the first.

The king of Nauerne is euermore vassall to the house of Aragon and Castell, yet the French kyng caused him to rebell, hoping thereby to subdue the sayde Countries.

Of late dayes the French king by false treason caused sir Robert de la March to submit himselfe to the Emperors maiesty, who receyued him vpon his oth & fidelity, pardoning al offences past, is not this false traitor returned, and is of the French partie? how may that Court, that counsaile, that king, that realme that consenteth to treason and periury by mayntenaunce of traytors be called honorable? hath not the French kyng sworne, and is bounden neuer to retaine the Switchers in wages to make warre against the Emperor? and yet doth at this day: And albeit that his maiestie speaketh not of these thinges, yet he well considereth them. I trust verely sayd this noble man that God sayth, viue Burgoigne, euery man ỹ heard this reherſall, knew that it was true, howbeit he was not aunswered, but some English knights sayd, Sir you haue sayd well, and as God will all must be. Thus was this narration ended.

In thys season the Emperor gat the towne of Mewzon: Also of the Emperours partie a great armie arryued in the Duchy of Mylan, and also the Emperors power besieged the Noble Citie of Mesliers, but the Captaine called Franciscus was suspected of treason, for he remooued with the hoste from the siege without knowlege of the Emperor.

The Emperour made a siege volant about the Citie of Tournay, for the rescue whereof and also of Mesliers, the French king made a great army and himselfe in person.

Duryng this siege the Frenchmen tooke a Spaniardes ship laden with English mens goodes at Margate within the kings streames, not without great slaughter on both parties, yet the Frenchmen were a hundred and three score men, and of Spaniards and Englishe men onely. xxv.

The King of Denmarke Christianus came to see the Emperour hys brother in lawe (beyng a stately prince) and meanes was made by the Lord Cardinall that they spake together without any great signe of amitie.

The Lorde Cardinall after he had soiorned in Bruges by the space of xiij. dayes and concluded diuers matters with the Emperor and accomplyshed his commission: he tooke leaue of his maiestie, and lykewise did all the noble men of Englande, and after conuenient iorneis arryued with all hys company at Calice, where the Ambassadors of Fraunce taryed him, and immediatly after his arryuing he treated with them of peace, yet not so earnestly as he did before, and that perceyued well the said Ambassadors, and wrote thereof to the French king, yet the welth and prosperitie of both the realmes

and their ſubiects were highly reaſoned betwene the Cardinall and the ſayd Ambaſſadors, eſpecially for fiſhing, wherevpon was concluded that the ſubiectes of both the princes might freely fiſhe on the ſea, and repaire to anye port of the one or the other prince without robbyng, ſpoyling, or takyng vnto the ſecond day of Februarye next.

The French king with a mightie armie and himſelfe in perſon repaired to the Countrie of Cambray, minding to paſſe the ſtreytes, but they were withſtanded by the Emperors power, yet he continued there from October vnto Nouember wythout any thing doyng, to the great diſpleaſure of the French king. The Duke Daleſon heering that, made preparations with the Almaynes to paſſe the marrys by the poynt Dallans ꝛ there the Almaynes had made bridges of Pipes ꝛ veſſels, and brought thether their great ordinaunce. The Emperour beyng in the towne of Valencian and thereof aduertiſed, cauſed ſtrong watch to be made, and as they would haue paſſed, the Baſtarde Emery, and the Capitayne of Gaunt with twelue hundred men met with them, where was a great conflict and many men ſlayne, and at the laſt the Almaynes were put to flight and their bridges and other prouiſions broken: Of the frenche partie were ſlayne in thys conflict. xiiij. hundred men, and of the Burgonians were ſlayne the Baſtard Emery, the Capitaine of Gaunt and foure hundred men.

The Lord Cardinall after he had long treated with the Ambaſſadors of Fraunce, and coulde bring them to no conformitie of peace, he ſent to the Emperour the Lord of ſaint Johns, and ſyr Thomas Boleyn knight to aduertiſe his maieſtie thereof.

Lykewiſe the ſayde Lorde Cardinall ſent to the Frenche king the Erle of Worceſter, and the Biſhop of Ely to exhort his grace to peace, he heard them, but he gaue them but few words to aunſwere, and after they had bene .xix. or .xx. dayes in his hoſte, they tooke leaue and returned to Calice.

Duryng the continuaunce of the Cardinall in Calice all wryters and Patentes were there by hym ſealed and no Shrieues choſen for lacke of his preſence.

The king of Hungarie ſent an Ambaſſador to the kinges highneſſe for ayde agaynſt the Turke, whome the Cardinall honorably entertayned duryng his abode in Calice. His comming was for ayde as men ſayde agaynſt the French king.

The Lorde Cardinall after the returne of the Engliſhe Ambaſſadors from the Emperour and from the French king tooke ſhipping and landed at the port of Douer, the .xxvij. day of Nouember, and there tooke his iorney to Blechyngly, where the kings grace welcommed him, geuing him alſo thankes for his great paynes and trauayle.

The laſt daye of December the Cardinall accompanied the Emperors Ambaſſadors to the court where they were honorably receyued and highlye feaſted during their abode there, and many ſumptuous and gorgious diſguiſinges, enterludes and banquetes made in the ſame ſeaſon.

This yere was a great peſtilence and death in London and other places of the realme, and many noble Capitaynes dyed, as the Lorde Broke, Sir Weſton Browne, Syr John Heron, Sir John Peche and manye other people.

A great peſtilence.

The

The Biſhop of London, Doctor Fitz James, likewiſe deceaſed this yere, and Doctor Tunſtall was preferred to the ſame benefice

The Lorde Thomas Hawarde Erle of Surrey, came out of Irelande to the court the. xxb. day of Januarie, when he had bene there the ſpace of xx. monethes in great trauaile and paine, and often tymes ſore troubled by the wild Iriſh, howbeit by his nobleneſſe and manhod he brought the Lords of Ireland to the kinges due obeyſaunce, and had of them many victories to his perpetuall laude and praiſe.

The French men robbed and ſpoyled the kinges ſubiectes and Merchaunts vpon euery coaſt of the Sea.

The Frenchmen this yere ſpoyled and ſhamefully robbed the kinges ſubiectes on euery coaſt of the Sea, ſo that wherſoeuer the kyng roade his poore ſubiectes came with lamentacions and cryes ſhewing his grace of the crueltie of the frenchmen and of their inhumane dealing with them, but euer the French Ambaſſadours promiſed reſtitucion of euery thing, but none was reſtored.

In this moneth of January the king commaunded all his ſhippes of warre to be made in a readineſſe, which was done with all diligence.

About this time the Duke of Albany arriued in Scotlande, notwithſtanding that the French king ſware vnto the Cardinall that he ſhould neuer come into Scotland wythout the king our ſouereigne Lordes conſent, but for all that he had commiſſion from the French king although the French king wrote to the king that he was entred Scotland without his aſſent.

King Henry the eight writeth a boke agaynſt Luther.

About this time the king wrote in Latine a vehement booke againſt Martyn Luther and confuted his iudgement, touching Indulgences, and defendeth the Biſhop of Romes auctority, and in the ende repreueth all his diſputacions concerning the Sacraments of the Church. The which booke the Pope liked ſo well that the ſeconde daye of February, the king being at Grenewhich, came thether the Cardinall with a Legation from Leo Biſhop of Rome, and alſo his Ambaſſador, on whome waighted many a noble man, the king met wyth them at his chamber doore welcoming them as though they had both come from Rome. Then ſayd the Cardinall, high and victorious king it hath pleaſed our Lorde God to indue your grace with a great multitude of manifolde graces as a king elect in fauour of the high Heauen, and ſo appereth preſently by your noble perſon, ſo formed & figured in ſhape and ſtature with force and pulcritude, which ſignifieth the preſent pleaſure of our Lorde God wrought in your noble grace. And further he prayſed his wiſedome, prudence, and learning, with many other goodly wordes in the praiſe of his moſt noble grace. And finally the Cardinall declared how the ſayd Biſhoppe of Rome had ſent his highneſſe an Acte in Bull vnder leade, declaring therein his grace to be the defendor of the Chriſtian fayth and his ſucceſſors for euermore.

This title Defendor of the fayth. was receiued from July Biſhop of Rome.

And when his grace had receyued the ſaid Bull and cauſed it to be read and publiſhed, he went to his Chappell to heere Maſſe accompanied with many nobles of his realme and alſo with Ambaſſadours of ſondry Princes, the Cardinall being reueſted to ſing Maſſe, the Erle of Eſſex brought the Baſon with water, the Duke of Suffolke gaue the aſſaye, the Duke of Northfolke held the towel, and ſo proceded to Maſſe. And that done he gaue vnto all them cleane remiſſion and bleſſed the King and the Queene and all the people: then was the Bull eftſones declared, and trumpettes blewe, the shalmes and saggebuttes plaied in honor of the kynges new style. Thus his highnesse went to dynner. In the middes whereof the king of Heraulds and his company began the larges, cryng. Henricus dei gratia rex Anglie, & Francie defensor fidei, & dominus Hibernie. Thus ended the dinner, with much habundaunce of vitaile and wine, to all maner of people.

The .x. day of February, the Lorde Hodie chiefe Baron of the kinges Eschequer gaue ouer his office, and for him was admitted by the Cardinall, maister John Fitziames, a right honourable man and well learned.

In this tyme was much businesse betwene the Emperor and the French king, wherefore the king sent to the sea sixe good shippes, well manned and vittayled for the warre: the Admirall was called Christopher Coo, a man expert on the Sea, for safegarde of the Marchauntes, and other the kinges subiects, that were grieuously spoyled and robbed on the sea, by Frenchmen, Scottes, and other rouers.

This tyme the. viij. day of February, the Lorde Dacres Warden of the Marches of Scotland, entered into Scotland with fiue hundred men, by the kinges commaundement, and there proclaymed that the Scottes should come into the kinges peace, by the first day of Marche folowyng, or else to stand at their perilles, the Duke of Albanie beyng then within fiue myles, with a mightie power of Scottes.

The .xj. day of February, Sir George Neuell, Lorde a Burgayny, beyng then prisoner in the Tower was brought to Westminster, and there in the kinges Bench confessed his enditement of misprision, in the cause of Edward late Duke of Buckyngham to be true, and after the open confession thereof, led againe to the Tower.

The Lorde Montacute the kinges cosyn, was about this tyme reconciled to his graces fauour, which had bene prisoner in the Tower, wyth sir Edward Neuell knight, this sir Edwarde Neuell was forbidden the kinges presence, for bearyng fauour to the Duke of Buckingham.

This yere the second of Marche, certaine noble men of the Empire arriued in England to passe into Spaine, who were honourably receyued, and in honor of them great iustes and triumphes were made, and that finished, and done, they tooke their leaue and departed on their iournay.

Also this tyme commission was geuen throughout the realme, for generall musters to be had, to know what power might be made within the same and also men sworne of what substaunce and landes they were of, and the Cardinall aduertised of the same: not without grudgyng of the people, and maruaylyng why they should be sworne for their awne good.

General musters taken throughout al the realm, and men sworne what value and substaunce they were of.

The Citie of London was this moneth aduertised of the commyng of the Emperor, wherefore was made great preparation: and the Citizens sent the kings grace one hundred tall men well harnessed, to furnishe his nauie, appoynted to kepe the narow seas.

The French king certefyed the kinges highnesse, by his letters dated in Marche, howe the Graund capitaine of Fraunce, the Countie de Palais, Mounsire de Lescue, and other noble men of Fraunce, had wonne the towne of Milaine, which was not true, for within fiue or sixe dayes after, it was euidently knowen that the Frenche men were beaten backe, and had wonne nothing, to their great shame and repprothe.

The French king certefieth king Henry of a lye.

Moreouer

Moreouer the same season the Frenche king wrote his letters to the Seignory and commonaltie of Gean, to sende him three Carectes, and sixe Galyes furnished for the warres, vnto his port of Brest, to maintaine hys warres agaynst the foresayd Emperor, who made him by theyr letters suche a reasonable excuse, that he was contented to spare them for that tyme.

A gracious and a mercifull act of king Henry the eyght.

The kinges highnesse kept this yere his Easter at his Manor of Richemonde, and caused his Amner to make inquirie, eight myles round about the sayd Manor, what poore people was in euery parishe. And for the eschuing of murder, that most commonly fortuned euery good Friday, by reason of the great resort of poore people, his grace caused them to be refreshed with hys almose at home at their houses.

About this tyme a rouer or theefe of Scotland, called Duncan Camell, was after long fight taken on the sea, by a Squier of Cornewall called maister John Arondell, and presented to the kinges highnesse, who committed him to the tower of London, where he remained prisoner a long season after.

Preparation made for warre.

The king like a Prince which foreseeth all thinges, sawe what warre was like to ensue, caused the Erle of Surrey his highe Admirall, to put in readinesse his naule, both for the conducting of the Emperor into England, and also for the defence of his subiectes, which were dayly robbed and spoyled on the sea, which Lord Admirall tooke such diligence with the helpe of Sir William Fitzwilliam his vice Admirall, that all the shippes by the beginning of Aprill, were rigged and trimmed, and in especiall the Henry grace of Due, the kings great shyp, was brought out of the riuer of Thames into the Downes, readie to sayle whether God and the king would.

The Iustices of Assise poysoned by an infectious ayre.

In this yere at the Assise kept at the Castell of Cambridge in Lent, the Iustices, and all the Gentlemen, Bayliffes, and other, resorting thether, tooke such an infection, whether it were of the sauour of the prisoners, or of the filth of the house, that many Gentlemen, as sir John Cut, sir Gyles Alyngton knightes, and many other honest women thereof dyed, and almost all which were their present, were sore sick and narrowly escaped with their lyues. And this yere also dyed Sir Edward Bownynges, knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Edward Belknap, valyant Capitaines which were suspected to be poysoned, at a banquet made at Arde, when the two kinges met last.

A pestilence and dearth.

This yere also, was not without pestilence nor dearth of Corne, for Wheate was sold this yere in the Citie of London, for. xx. shillings a quarter, and in other places for. xxvj. shillings. viij. pence. And in the same yere in December, dyed Leo Bishop of Rome, for whome was chosen, one Adrian borne at Utrike the Emperours schoole maister. And in the same moneth Gawan Douglas Bishop of Dunkell in Scotland, fled out of Scotland into England because the Duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotlande, and had taken vpon him to be gouernor of the king, and the realme, to whome the king assigned an honest pencion to liue on. But when the king was aduertised, that the Duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotland, and had taken the rule of the yong king his realme, and he much doubted the sequele of the matter, considering the Duke to bee heyre apparaunt to the Crowne of Scotlande: Wherefore he sent Clarenseaux king at Armes into Scotland, with commaundement, that he should declare to the Duke of Albanie, that that his pleasure was, that he should depart the realme of Scotland for two causes, the one, because it was promised by the French king, at the last meetyng, that he should not come into Scotland, the second was, that the king of England was vncle to the king of Scottes, and by the verye bonde of nature, ought to defend his nephewe. Wherefore his nephew beyng yong, and in the custodie of him, to whome if he should die, the realme of Scotlande should discend, he doubted least he might be brought out of the way, as other Dukes of Albany before had serued the heyres of Scotland: and if he would not auoyde Scotland, then Clarenseaux was commaunded to defye him, which accordingly did defye him at holye Rode house in Edenborough to the which he answered, that neither the French king, nor the king of England, should let him to come into his naturall Countrie, by their agreement: also as touchyng the yong king, he sayd, that he loued him as his souereigne Lord, and him would keepe and protect agaynst all other.

When Clarenseaux had reported hys answere to the king, then he knew well that all thys was the French kings doyng, wherefore he prouided in all things accordingly. The Erle of Anguishe of Scotlande that had maried Ladie Margaret, the king our souereigne Lordes sister, late wyfe vnto king James of Scotlande, that was slayne at Floddon field, was by the Duke of Albany, sent by a coloured Ambassade into Fraunce, where shortly after his arriuyng, he was by the French king committed to prison, and hys brother likewise, which escaped after as you shall heare.

Also the sixt day of Marche, the French king commaunded all Englishe mens goodes beyng in Burdeaux, to be attached and put vnder a rest: and lykewise deteyned the kings tribute, which he should haue out of Fraunce, and also the French Queenes Dowry, and when the king sent to him for it he euer gaue fayre wordes, and made delayes, but none was payde, and euer the Ambassador promised fayre. The French king attacheth the Englishmens goods.

The king thys yere kept the day of saint George with great solempnity, at his manour of Richmond, where were elected to the order of the Garter, Done Ferdinando brother to the Emperour, and Archduke of Oystrike, and syr Rychard Wyngfield knight by the Emperours meanes, to the which the Emperour had giuen two hundred pounde pention, out of the house of Burgoyne, which syr Edwarde Younynges before had of the Emperours gift. During thys warre betwene the Emperour and the French king, and the king of England lyng still an entreator betwene them, the English men were robbed on both sydes, and when their wynes were laden at Burdeaux, and readie to depart, they were attached, and the Marchants put in prison: the poore fisher men on the coast of England, sometime met with the french men and them spoyled, but to no recompence of that they had taken. The Marchaunts of Englande, that had factors at Burdeaux, complayned to the king of England, and shewed him how the French king, contrarie to his league and hys safeconduyt vnder hys seale, by his people, had taken their goods & empriſoned their factors and friends, & can haue no remedie. Likewise complayned all the Marchaunts, how their shippes were restrayned, in euery port of Fraunce, and their goodes ryfeled, and could haue no redresse. The king and his counsayle were sorie to here the complaynts of the Marchaunts, and so concluded to sende for the Frenche Imbassadours, to whom 1522 14 the Cardinall sayde: syr how is this chaunce happened? you haue promised euer in the name of the king your mayster that all leagues, promises, and couenaunts should be kept, and that full restitution should be made of euery hurt and dammage, and that firme peace and amity should be kept: but contrary to your saying, our Marchaunts be robbed and spoyled, yea, although he had graunted hys safeconduyt, yet they be robbed, and slayed at Burdeaux, is thys the peace that you and your mayster hath promised to be kept? is thys the amitie that he was sworne to keepe? Is thys the worde of a king? Is this the strength of a Prince to breake his safeconduyte? And where you adupsed our Marchauntes to sue in Fraunce for restitution, and did warraunt them to be restored, you haue put them to coste and losse, for they haue sued there long, and spent their goodes, without any redresse, and now you haue imprisoned them, and kept both them and their goods, is this iustice? is this restitution? And all thys was your procurement, and nowe see what is come of your promise, surely this may not be suffered, and beside thys the king is informed, that the king your maister hath spoken by him, foule and opprobrious words, yea, in the heering of the Englishe men which were sore greeued to heare such wordes, and were not able to be reuenged.

The Imbassadour of Fraunce sayde, that it was not so as it was reported: well sayde the Cardinall, if you note the Counsayle of England so light, as to tell fables, you be misaduised, but I praye you how often times hath the king written to your maister, for restitution of suche robberies as hath bene done, and yet can haue no redresse? Wherefore he graunted letters of marke, which may stande with the league, but Mounsire Chastilion hath taken Marchaunts of England prisoners, and hath sent certayne hether for their raunsome, thys is open warre and no peace. Maister President Polliot or Pulteyne the french Imbassadour, aunswered, that surely the matters which were alleged agaynst his maister the French king, were but forged matters and not true: but he sayde that for a truth, daylie in the Court of Fraunce, were complaintes made agaynst the Englishemen for great robberies done by them, as well on lande as sea, affirming it to be done in the Emperors quarell, and yet the French king for the loue he beareth to England, letteth his subiects to be vnheard, although he daylie lament the great iniurie, done to him and his subiectes by Englishe men: and therefore my Lorde I pray you beleue no such tales, till I haue tolde you the truth.

Then the Cardinall called the foure hostages, that laye here for the payment of money for Tournay, and they foure were deliuered, to my Lord of saint Ihones, to sir Thomas Louell, to sir Andrew Wyndsore, and to syr Thomas Neuell, euery knight one to kepe safe, and none of their countrey to speake with them priuely, and the Imbassadour was commaunded to kepe his house in silence, & not to come in presence, till he was sent for, which order sore abashed the French hostages, and the Imbassadour, but there was no remedy, and commaundement was geuen to the Maior of London, to attache all the Frenchmen, bodye and goodes, and them to keepe in prison, till he heard farther of the kinges pleasure: then were all the Frenchmen in London and about, arrested and brought to prison, so that all the prisons in and about London, were full of them, some of them escaped by speaking dutche, and sayd they were Flemings borne, which was not tried.

All the french men in London were attached and committed to prison.

The

The king for safegarde of his Marchaunts sent .xxviij. goodly shippes to the Sea, well manned and trimmed for the warres, and seuen other ships he sent towarde Scotlande, which entered the Frithe, and proffered to enter into the Scottish shippes that lay in the hauen, but the Scottes ranne their shippes on lande, and the Englishe men folowed with boates and landed, and set the ships on fire, and at Lithe tooke certayne prisoners, which they brought into Englande, and still the kinges great Naule kept the narrow Seas, for then was neyther peace betwene England and Fraunce, nor open warre as you haue heard.

The comming of Charles the Emperor to Calice.

The king had perfite knowlege, that Charles the Emperour would be at the kings towne of Calice, the .xxiij. daye of Maye, to passe thorowe Englande into Spaine, wherefore the king sent the Marques Dorset, accompanied with diuers knightes and gentlemen, to receyue him at Calice, which in all hast sped him thether. Likewise the Cardinall toke his iourney towarde Douer the twentie day of May, and rode through London, accompanied with two Erles .xxvj. knightes, and a hundred Gentlemen, eyght Byshops, ten Abbottes, thirtie Chapleines, all in Ueluet and Satin, and yomen seuen hundred, and so by iorneying he came to Douer the .xxvj. daye beyng Monday. In the meane season tydinges were brought to the king, that the French king had sent a great armie toward Calice, and the men of warre lay at Abuile, Munstrell, Bullein and about, nere the English pale. Wherefore the king like a prince that foresawe all, and entending not to be deceyued, wrote to his Nobles, and Cities and townes, to prepare certaine men of warre in a readinesse, which was shortly done, and so they were sent to the Naule, so that they might shortlye be at Calice if neede requyred.

Note here the state of Cardinall Wolsey.

On Sunday the .xxv. daye of Maye, the Lorde Marques Dorset, the Byshop of Chichester, and the Lorde de Lawarre, with other noble men, at the water of Grauelyng, receyued the Emperour in the name of the king of England, and so the Emperour embraced them, and he hauyng in hys company many noble men, came toward Calice, where at the Turnepike in the Lordship of Marke, he was receyued of syr Edwarde Guylford Marshall of Calice, with fiftie men of armes richely besene, and also a hundred archers on horsebacke, then in passing forward towarde Calice, the ordinaunce shot terribly, & into Calice he was receyued with procession, and then by the Lord Barne deputie there, and the counsayle of the towne: And after he was receyued by the Maior and Aldermen of the towne, and lastly of the Maior and Marchauntes of the staple, and so conueyed to the Checker, and there lodged.

On the Monday, he and all the Nobles of Spaine, Flaunders, and Germany, tooke ship at Calice and landed at Douer, at foure of the clock at after noone, and wyth hym the Duke Daluay, the prince of Orenge, the Countie of Nassaw, the Countie Vascord, the Lorde Egmonde, and the Marques of Brandenbrough, all in one shyp bote. The Cardinall receyued hym on the Sandes, accompanyed with three hundred Lordes, Knightes, and Gentlemen of Englande: the Emperour embraced the Cardinall, and tooke him by the arme, and so passed forward and tooke horses, and rode together to Douer Castell, where they were lodged. The Englishe Herbingers diligently lodged the Emperours traine, euery man according to hys degree. The king of England was come to Cantorburie, the.xxbij. daye of May, and receaued by the Archbyshop: and hearing of the Emperours arriuall, with a small companie on the Wednesday, beyng the Assension euen, he rode to Douer, and with muche ioye and gladnesse the Emperour and he met, and there taried the Assension day, and on Friday, the king brought the Emperour aborde on his newe ship, called the Henry grace de dieu, a ship of.xb. hundred and rowed about to all his great ships, which then lay in Douer rode, the Emperour and his Lordes, much praysed the making of the ships, and especially the artilerie, they sayde, they neuer saw ships so armed.

The same daye at after none, the two noble princes marched forwarde to Cantorbury, where the Maior and Aldermen receiued them, without the towne, with a solempne oration, to whome the Emperors Secretarie answered ornatly. Then the Princes with their swordes borne naked before them, and the Emperor on the right hand, entered the Citie of Cantorburye, and so with procession were brought to Christes churche, where the Archebishop and twelue Prelates mitered, receyued them vnder a Canapie, and so they offered to the sacrament, and the Emperor was brought to the Bishops palace, where he lay for that night, and the king lodged at saint Augustines. The morrowe after, these Princes remoued to Sityngborne, and the next daye to Rochester, where the Bishop receyued them with the whole Couent, and on Monday they came to Gratesend by one of the clocke, where they tooke their Barges, and there were thirtie Barges appoynted, for the strangers, and so by syx of the clocke they landed at Grenewhiche, the same Mondaye the seconde daye of June, where the Emperor was of the king newlye welcomed, and all his nobilitye, and at the hall doore the Queene and the Princes, and all the Ladies, receyued and welcomed hym: and he asked the Queene blessing (for that is the fashion of Spayne, betweene the Aunt and Nephewe) the Emperor had great ioye to see the Queene his Aunt, and in especiall his young Cosyn germaine the Lady Mary. The Emperor was lodged in the kinges lodging, which was so richely hanged, that the Spaniardes wondered at it, and specially at the riche cloth of estate: nothing lacked that might be gotten, to cheere the Emperor and his Lordes and all that came in his company, were higly feasted.

The Wednesday, the more to do the Emperor pleasure, was prepared a Justes royall: and as the king was arming him, there came one George Luffkin and shewed him that there was one come from his Imbassador in Fraūce, the king called for the messenger, and he deliuered the letters, which the king red, and said to sir William Compton, tell the Emperor that I haue newes, if it pleaseth hym to come hether: Sir William Compton went and tolde this to the Emperor, which without delay came to the king, which shewed hym the letters from Sir Thomas Cheyney his Imbassador, wherein was conteyned the definitiue answere, made aswell to Sir Thomas Cheney, as to Clarenseaux king at armes of Englande, by the French king, to the kinges requestes: for you shall vnderstand, that the king of England by hys Imbassador, had often tymes demaunded, both his tribute and his lawfull dette, and also restitution to be made to his subiects grieued, and farther also the league was broken, by making warre on the Emperor, so that now by the league the king of Englande should be enemie, to him that first brake, and did take part with the other, yet he had so much compassion, on sheding of Christen bloud, that he would not enter warre but shew himselfe a mediator, and an entreator betwene them. And vpon this sir Thomas Cheyney had often moued the French king, and also moued him to take peace with the Emperor for two yeres, so that some mediacion of peace might be entreated in the meane season: to all this the French king aunswered, we haue well considered your Maisters desire, to the which we nothing agree, nor holde vs content with his request. Sir sayde the Ambassadour, the king my Maister shall be aduertised of your aunswere by me, wherefore I beseech your grace of safeconduite, to retourne into England: then sayd the king, there is an officer of Armes come out of England, let him come and he shall be herd and haue an aunswere, to which thing sir Thomas Cheiney aunswered not, but with reuerence departed, and so on the .xxj. day of Maie, the sayd officer called Clarenseaux king at Armes, came to the French kinges chamber at Lions, which was accompanied with many noble men and Gentelmen, and then Clarenseaux put on his coate of Armes, and desyred license to speake, and libertie according to the law of Armes, which was to hym graunted: then he declared that where the French king was bound by league tripertite to keepe peace with the Emperour, and with the king of England, & whosoeuer first brake, the other two to be enimies to him, to the which league the French king was sworne, which league he apparauntly had broken, by making warre on the Emperour, by Sir Robert de la Marche, and by himselfe in person. Wherefore the king by that league must be his enimie, and take part against him.

Also he declared, the French king kept away the kinges rentes, and debtes, due to him. Also that he detayned the Dower of the French Queene. Also that contrary to his promise, he had sent the duke of Albany into Scotland: Also that contrary to Justice he had emprisoned Marchants, hauing hys safeconduit, where they should haue gone in safetie, seyng there was no warre proclaymed, betwene hym and the kyng his Maister: all these articles with many mo, the king my maister is readye to proue. Nay sayd the French king I began not the warre, nor sent Robart de la March to make warre, but cõmaunded hym to the contrary, and or I made warre in proper person, hys warre was open, and he had our towne of Tournay strongly besieged, and as touching the Duke of Albany, it hath cost me .xl. thousand Frankes to kepe hym out of Scotland, but I could not let him to go into hys owne countrey. Thus the French king excused hys vntruth. Then sayd Clarenseaux, sir I am farther charged to tell you, that the king my souereigne Lord, holdeth you for his mortall enimye, from this daye forth and all your adherents: well sayde the French king, I loked for this a great while agon, for sith the Cardinall was at Bridges, I loked for no nother, but you haue done your message: then the French king rose and departed, and Clarenseaux was conueighed to his lodging, and shortly after, Sir Thomas Cheiney and he by a safeconduit departed and came to Bulleine, and there Mounsire Fayett Capitaine there, stayed them both till the Ambassadour of Fraunce, which had lien in England, were clerely deliuered out of Calice. The whole circumſtaunce of the demaundes and defiaunce, and the French kynges anſwere, was conteyned in the letter, which was brought to the king, which ſhewed it to the Emperor (as you haue heard) but while the king and the Emperor loked on the letter a ſodaine noiſe roſe amongſt both their ſubiects, that it was a letter of defiaunce ſent to them both by the French king, which was nothing ſo. Thus now was the warre open of all parties, betweene England and Fraunce, and Spayne.

The cõming of the Emperour into London.

On Friday the firſt day of June, the king and the Emperour, with all their companies marched towarde London, where in the way, a myle from Saint Georges barre was ſet a riche Tent of cloth of Golde, in which Tent were two lodgings, one for the Emperor, & another for the king, where theſe two Princes ſhifted them. And when the Heraulde had appoynted euery man their rowmes, then euery man ſet forwarde in order, richely apparayled in cloth of Golde, Tiſſue, Siluer, Tynſell, and Veluets of all coloures. There lacked no maſſy Cheynes, nor curious Collers: an Engliſheman and a ſtraunger roade euer together, matched accordyng to their degrees. Before the Emperour and the king, were borne two ſwordes naked, then the two Princes folowed in Coates of cloth of Golde, embraudered with Siluer, both of one ſuite: after them folowed the kinges Henxemen, in coates of purple Veluet, pieled and paned with riche cloth of Siluer, and with them were matched the Emperors Henxemen, in equall number, in coates of crimoſen Veluet, with two gardes, the one golde, and the other ſiluer: then folowed the Capitaynes of the gardes, then the Emperors garde on the right hand, and the Engliſhe garde on the left hand, and ſo in this order they went forward, and in the way the Maior John Milborne, and his brethren, in fine Skarlet and well horſed, met with the Emperour and the king where one ſir Thomas Mooze knight, and well learned, made to them an eloquent Oration, in the prayſe of the two Princes, and of the peace and loue betweene them, and what comfort it was to their ſubiectes, to ſee them in ſuch amitie, and howe that the Maior and Citizens, offered any pleaſure or ſeruice that in them lay, nere their ſouereigne Lord.

When this was done, they came into Southwarke, where the Clergye receyued them in Copes, with Croſſes, and Cenſers, and ſo kept the one ſyde of the ſtrete, all the Citie through. When they came by the Marſhalſie, and the kinges Benche, the Emperour deſyred pardon of the king, for the priſoners, and he at the Emperours requeſt, pardoned a great number of them. When they were almoſt at the bridge foote, there was a ſtay, the king demaunded the cauſe, and it was tolde him, that the Heraulde had appointed two gentlemen to ryde together, one was ỳ Ambaſſador from the Marques of Mantua, to the Emperor, & the other from the Citie of Seynes, to the Emperour alſo, and the Citie, and the Marques were not friendes, the Emperour incontinent, ſent his Lorde Chamberleyn to them, ſaiyng: that if they would that day do him honor, he would thank them, & if they would not ride as they were appoynted, he prayed them to depart. When ỳ lord Chamberleyn had tolde this meſſage, they rode forth and made no more curteſie.

When they were come to the drawe bridge, there were ſet Targets, of the armes of the Emperour and his dominions, richely painted, and on the other ſyde, ſtoode one great Giaunt, repreſentyng Hercules, with a mighty Club in his hande, and on the other syde stoode another Giaunt, repzesentyng Sampson, with the Jawe bone of an Asse in his hande. These two Giauntes helde a great Table, in the which was wzitten in golden letters, all the Emperours stile. From the dzaw bzidge these two Pzinces passed, to the middes of the bzidge, where was rayse a fayze edefice, with Towers embattayled and Gates, all lyke Masonry, of white and blacke, like Touch and white Marble: aboue this buildyng was a fayze Pagiant, in the which stoode Jason all in harnesse, hauyng before him a golden fleece, and on the one syde of hym stoode a fiery Dzagon, and on the other syde stoode two bulles which beastes cast out fire continuallye, and in a tower on the one syde stoode a fayze Mayde repzesentyng the Ladie Medea, which was verye straungely and richely apparayled.

And when they had beheldе this Pagiaunt, they came to the Conduite at Gracious streete, and from thence to Leaden hall, and to the Conduite in Cozne hill, and so to the great Conduite in Cheape, and to the Standard and little Conduite in Chepe, where at euery of them were very riche, sumptuous, and costly Pagiantes. And all the way as they went the Citizens well apparayled stoode within rayles set on the left syde of the streetes, and the Clergie on the right syde in riche Copes, which senced the Pzinces as they passed, and all the streetes were richely hanged with clothes of golde, siluer, Ueluet and Arras, and in euery house almost Minstrelsy, and in euery strete were these two verses wzitten in letters of Golde.

Henricus fidei, Carolus Ecclesie.

Which verses were also wzitten in other Tables in Golden letters, as ensueth.

When they were past the little Conduite they came to the west ende of Paules Church and there they alighted, & there was a Canapy ready vnder which they two stoode and were receyued by the Archebishop of Cauntozbury, and .xxj. Pzelates in pontificalles and so they offered at the high aulter and returned to hozsebacke, and came to the blacke Friers where the Emperour was lodged in great ropaltie: All his nobles were lodged in his newe palace of Bzidewell, out of the which was made a Gallery to the Emperozs lodgyng, which Gallery was very long, & that Gallery & all other Galleryes there were hanged with Arras. The kinges Palace was so richely adozned of all thinges, that my wit is to dull to discriue them, oz the riches of the hangyngs, oz the sumptuous buyldyng and giltyng of Chambers.

On Whitsonday the .viij. day of June the Emperoz and the king with great honour roade to the Church of Saint Paule, and there heard highe Masse. When Masse was done they returned to Bzidewell, where the Emperoz was highly feasted. The same Sonday at after noone the two pzinces went by water to Westminster, and roade to the Church, and in ridyng all the sanctuary men cryed mercy and pardon, they were so hastie and pzeased so neere that the Sergeauntes at Armes coulde scase keepe them from touchyng the Emperoz and the king: The Cardinall gaue them a gentle aunſwere which contented them for a tyme. They were receyued with Proteſſion into the Abbey and heard Euenſong & beheld king Henry the ſeuenthes Chapell and then went into Weſtminſter hall, at the largeneſſe whereof the Emperour muche maruayled, then they turned to Bridewell and there ſupped.

On Monday they dyned in Southwarke with the Duke of Suffolke and hunted there in the Parke, and road to the Manor of Richemond to their lodgyng and the next day to Hampton Court, where they had great chere, and from thence on Thurſday to Windſore, where he hunted Fryday & Sa-terday. And on Sonday, Monday, Tueſday, and Wedneſday the Princes and their counſayle ſat moſt part in counſayle, & on Corpus Chriſti day, they with great tryumph rode to the College of Wyndſore where the Emperour ware his mantle of the Garter and ſat in his awne ſtall, and gaue to the He-raulds two hundred crownes: that day both the princes receyued the ſacrament, and after Maſſe both ſware to keepe the promiſes and league eche to other, for whiche amitie great ioy was made on both parties, and after the Maſſe was ended they went to dynner, where was great feaſting.

On Fryday they departed out of Windſore, and by eaſy iorneis came to Wyncheſter, the. xxij. day of June, and in the way thether, the Emperor hunted the Hart. Before the Emperor was come to Wyncheſter, the Erle of Surrey Admyrall of Englande with all the kinges Nauie was come to Hampton, and with him the Lorde Fitz Water, the Baron Curſon, Sir Gyles Capell, Syr Nicholas Carew, ſyr Rychard Wyngfield, Sir Ry-chard Jernyngham, Fraunces Bryan, Anthony Browne, John Ruſſell, of which many were of the kings priuie chamber: theſe with many mo departed from Hampton with thirtie ſhips well manned and ordinaunced in the ende of June, noyſing that they ſhould onely ſcoure the ſeas for ſafegarde of the Emperor and his Nauie: But they had priuie inſtructions to go to another place as you ſhall heare after.

All thys whyle was the warre on the parties of Picardie hot, and the Capitayne of Bullayn called Fayet wrote euer mockyng letters to the gar-riſon of Calice, and ſayde: if the garriſon of Calice would iſſue out, he would meete with them halfe way with foure thouſand men. Wherevpon ſyr Edward Guyldford Marſhall of Calice, whome the Capitaine of Bullaine called the Fyrebrand, becauſe it was his badge, ſet forth out of Calice the eleuen daye of June with twelue hundred men, and went out of Calice, and ſent a Purſuiaunt to the Capitaine of Bullayne certefying him that he was comming with his fyrebrand, and bad him keepe promiſe. This officer declared the meſſage to him, but he came not. Forth marched Sir Edward till he came to Marguiſon and taryed to ſee whether the Capitayne of Bullayne would come or no, and when he ſawe he came not, he ſet fyre in the towne, and the light horſemen forerayed the beaſtes and pillage, and brent Villages all about, which was well perceyued in the Countrie a farre off, and towarde night all the crewe came home with good pillage, and on the morrow ſyr Edward Guyldford deliuered a priſoner franke and free, on condition he ſhould tell the Capitaine of Bullaine that he had bene at Margui-ſon with his Fyrebrand, which truely did his meſſage, for the which the Capitayne brake his head: all the Caſtels and forteſſes in the Engliſhe pale were

were well manned and bytailed and lacked no artilerie, ſo that the Frenche men could doe them no harme.

When the Emperor and the king laye at Bychops Waltham they ioyntly ſent letters of defiaunce to the Duke of Lorraine, as Alye and confederate with the French king. The firſt day of July the Emperors Nauy ſayled before Hampton, which were. C.lxxx. goodly ſhippes. When the Emperors ſhippes were come, he tooke leaue of the king, and had great giftes geuen him and much money lent to him, and ſo the firſt day of July he tooke his ſhip, ſo with all his nauie he made ſaile towarde Spaine where he arriued in ſafetie the tenth day after.

The Emperour taketh his leaue and departeth out of England.

The king about this very time ſent to the Citie of London to borowe twentie thouſande poundes, which ſore chafed the Citizens, but the ſumme was promiſed, and for the payment the Maior ſent for none, but for men of ſubſtaunce. Howbeit the companies ſolde much of their plate. The ſumme was payde, and the king ſent his letter promyſing payment of the ſame, and ſo did the Cardinall. The poore men were content with thys payment and ſayde, let the riche Churles paye, for they may well. Lyke loane was practiſed through all the realme, and priuie ſeales delyuered for the repayment of the ſame.

This ſeaſon the.xxj.day of Maye was the Citie of Geane gotten by the Emperors Capitaine called Octauiano de Columna, which had with him foure thouſande and foure hundred Spanyardes, fiue thouſande Italyans, and foure thouſand Lanceknightes: and in the Citie was taken Porter de Nauarro the French kings familier Capitayne, and all the Lordes of Geane which fauoured the French king were taken priſoners or ſlayne, and eſpecially one Octauiano Farragoſo, which ruled there for the French king, was euill puniſhed: the ſpoyle of the Citie that the ſouldiours had, was foure thouſande Dukates beſide the pillage, which was a great thing

The Citie of Gean gotten by the Emperour.

Now let vs retourne to the Lord Admyrall of England which departed from Hampton as you haue heard, and ſo with his nauy ſayled and ſkowred the Seas, and at the laſt came on the coaſt of Britaine, and commaunded the wyſeſt Maiſters and Mariners to boy the hauen of Morles, which was done, and ſo the next night all the flete came to the hauen of Morles in ſafety and mored their ſhippes together. Then all men were commaunded to harneſſe and to aduaunce their ſtandardes, and all ſouldiers to giue their attendaunce on their Capitaynes, and then the Lord Admyrall appoynted and cauſed .xiiij. peeces of ordynaunce called Faucons to be brought to lande and drawne forth with ſtrength of men. Then when all men that ſhould go forewarde were landed, the Lorde Admyrall with banner diſplayed tooke lande on the Eaſt ſide of the hauen the firſt day of July, and with hym a fayre band of ſouldiers, to the number of ſeauen thouſand, whome the ſayd Lorde Admirall and ſir Richard Wingfield brought in good order of battayle, and cauſed Chriſtopher Morres the Maiſter Gunner to ſee all thinges redy prepared, and then about eyght of the clock the firſt day they marched toward Morles in good order of battayle with banners diſplayed. The alarme roſe in the Countrie and came to the towne of Morles whereby the gentlemen of the countrie ſhewed themſelues pricking, but when they heard the Gunnes they fled as though they neuer vſed warre. and went to the walles and shut the gates and layed ordinaunce where was most ieoperdy. The Englishmen had gone. v. long mile and were now come to the subburbes of the towne: then the Englishe Archers shot, and the Britons them defended: then the Admyrall commaunded the towne to be assaulted, then the Lord Fitzwater and the Baron Curson quartered the towne on all sides, the Englishmen shot with long bowes, & the Britons with Crosbowes, which defended themselues manfully. Before the port Morues where is a Meason de Dieu *. At this gate gaue the assaut Sir Richard Wingfielde, Nicholas Carew, Fraunces Bryan, sir John Wallop and al their bends, hauing with them thre peces of ordinaunce called Faucons, which the Maister Gunner oft times shot, but the Britones had set the gate full of Arcubusshes, then the Gunner sayd, haue at the wicket, and in the smoke of the gunnes let vs enter the gate, the Gentelmen assented, then the sayde Sir Christopher Gunner strake the locke of the wicket, so that it flew open, then in the smoke came to the gate the said Christopher and the other forenamed Gentelmen, and when Christopher came to the gate he found the wicket open and entred, and the gentelmen followed, the Britons defended themselues, but they were put backe and slayne, then was the greate gate opened and then entred the souldiers that were on the other side of the towne. When the Britons on the walles saw the towne gotten, some fled at the Posterne, & some by another way, the best way that they could.

Morles assaulted and gotten.

The Erle of Surrey with Banner displayed tooke the market place. Then the souldiors fell to pillage and rifled the chestes and ware houses of Marchauntes, for the towne of Morles was very riche, and specyally of linnen cloth, the Gentelmen suffered the souldiers to doe what they would. When the souldiers had taken their pleasure of the town as much for a truth or more then they coulde beare away.

The Lord Admyrall commaunded the Trumpettes to blow, and commaunded all men to sette fyer in all places of the towne, the fayre Market place was set on fyer, and eth subburbs brent ardantly. Wherefore all men were commaunded to their standardes, and about syx of the clocke the armie retreated, and as they passed they brent diuers villages and places. And when night approched they drew together and all night laye on lande abiding their enemies. And the next day with honor they tooke their shippes, and when all men were shipped and fewe or none missed: The Lorde Admirall commaunded .xbj.or.xbij. shippes small and great lyng in the hauen to be brent. Then they sayled forth and came to anker before saint Polle de Lion, then he commaunded that the Foyst and other small shippes and great botes should be manned to enter into an harborow for shippes called Pympoll or Pimpole, which was sone done, the botes entred the place and some landed, but then the Brytons were to strong, and so they toke their botes and bet the Britons on the shore, and the Britons shot great ordinance at the Englishmen, but it did them no harme, and yet the Englishmen brent a shyppe of two hundred and many small vessels. When time came the whole flete sayled into the hauen of Brest and with barkes and rowe barges entered the hauen and tooke lande, and some Englishmen did so much that they set fyer in houses nere the Castell. And euen as the Englishmen sayled by the coast, the Britons them askried and fortefied the landing places, yet dayly ly the Englyſhmen ſkyrmyſhed with the Britons and came ſafelye to their ſhips againe: with thys warre was all the Duchy of Britain ſore troubled.

When the Lord Admyrall had wonne the towne of Morles as you haue heard: He called to him certayne Squyres whome for their hardineſſe and noble courage he made knights, firſt Sir Fraunces Bryan, ſir Anthonye Broune, ſir Richard Cornwall, ſir Thomas More, ſir Gyles Huſe, ſir John Ruſſell, ſir John Raynſford, ſir George Cobham, ſir John Cornwalles, ſir Edwarde Rigley and diuers other, and after he wrote letters to the king of his good ſpede: in the which he much praiſed al the gentelmen and ſouldiers for their hardyneſſe. When he had ſayled a while on the ſeas, he had letters ſent from the king that he ſhoulde retreyte, and ſo he came withall his fleete vnder the Ile of Wyght to a place called the Row, and then he departed from his ſhippe and came to Eſtamſtede the one and twentie day of July to the king, of whome he was well welcomed you may be ſure. And ſo on Monday the thre and twentie daye of July the king and he came to London to the Cardynals place and there ſate in counſaile to determyne what ſhould be done. After this the king dyned wyth the Cardinall the .xxiij. daye of July, where he reherſed that he had knowledge that the Admirall of Bry-taine was in Morles with a hundred horſemen & a hundred croſbowes, and yet he fled, & the king much commended the Lord Admyrall for his paine and hardineſſe, and prayſed them of his gard, and ſpecially .I. which left pilfering and neuer went from the Lorde Capitaine.

On the thirde day of July while this enterpriſe was done at Morles, certaine Frenchmen to the number of three hundreth horſemen came neere to the Caſtell of Guiſnes, and kept themſelfe in a cloſe couert, and ſo appered. viij.or.x. horſemen, and came neere Guiſnes: out of the Caſtell came .viij. Engliſhe Archers, and iſſued out of the Gate, and fell with the Frenche horſemen in ſkirmiſh: to the Frenchmens reſkue came foure men of Armes and ſkirmiſhed with the Archers which were afoote. Then out of Guiſnes iſſued .xij. Dimilances all Welſhemen, and ranne boldelye to the Frenchemen in reſcue of the footmen. Then the whole bend of Frenche men iſſued out and ſet on the Welſhemen, the footemen ſhot while arrowes laſted and were faine to fight with ſwordes, the Welſhemen kept themſelues together, and entered into the bend of Frenchmen, and brake their ſpeares, and then fought ſo with ſwordes, that they made away, ſo that they eſcaped from the bende of three hundred horſemen, and of the Frenchmen were ſlaine thre men, and fiue horſe, the footemen were ouerpreſſed, and ſolde their liues dere, for the French men ſlue them all, and woulde take none priſoner, they were ſo angrie with the killyng of their horſe.

Alſo the .xxv. day of July, ſir William Sandes Treaſorer of Calice, and Sir Edwarde Guilforde Marſhall, with Banners ſpred, iſſued out of Calice with .xiiij.C. men, and went into the French pale lokyng for Mon-ſire Foyat, which was a great mocker and a cowarde: But when he appe-red not, they went to Whitſandbay, and ſet it on fyre, and the people fled to the Church which was fortified and ſtood at defence, the body of the Church was wonne, and then they tooke the Steple, and ſome yelded themſelues, but the remnant by counſaile of a prieſt mainteyned ſo long, that the Steple was fiered, and then the prieſt cryed for ſuccour, but it was to late, and ſo the French people was faine to leape the Steple, and diuers perished, and they that were saued were led to Calice as prisoners. Farther the. xxiij. day of the same Moneth, Thwaites a Capitaine of an Englishe Shippe tooke land beside Bullein, and went vp three myle into the Countrey to a towne called Newe Castell and forrayed all the Countrey, and in his returne set fyre on the towne and brent a great part thereof mauger the Bullenoys, and with his bowes and men which onely was vi. score, he put backe. lxxx. Hagbushes and three hundred men of warre of the Countrey and so came to their Shippe with all the bootie and lost no man, notwithstandyng they were sore folowed to their ship.

French

On the. vj. day of July the Cardinall sat in the starre Chamber at Westminster, where he sayde, my Lordes it is reason that you should knowe the honourable enterprise done by the Lorde Admirall and his company in Britayne which hath dispoyled and destroyed the great towne of Morles in Britayne with all the villages and Countrey adioynyng to the same, which is in the Frenche Dominion, which mischiefe had neuer risen if Fraunces the French king had kept his othe and promise. For he is bound that he should neuer retayne the Swyches from the Emperor, nor that he shall not inuade any of the Emperors landes or dominions, which he hath done, for he hath inuaded the Countrie of Henaude and Cambrices, and taken Hedyng and Fountraby with many other iniuries. For when the king sent me and other to his great costes the last yere to Calice to treate an vnitie and peace betwene them, all our saiyngs were by the French king turned into a mockery. Also contrary to his promise he hath suffered Duke John of Albany to enter the realme of Scotland to the great perill of the yong king, Nephew to our souereigne Lorde, and also entendeth to mary the Queene of Scottes contrary to the kinges honour. The sayde Frenche king also withholdeth the kinges dueties, and his sisters Dower: wherefore of necessitie the king is entered into warre, for no Prince will suffer the wrong that the French king offereth him, as an vntrue and forsworne Prince, wherefore for your awne welth you must now ayde your Prince, trustyng to punishe and chastice him to your great honour and fame.

All Frenchmen and Scottes imprisoned.

Then by commaundement were all Frenchmen and Scottes imprisoned, and the goods seazed, and all such as were denizens were commaunded to shew their letters patents, and such as were allowed had all their goodes and the other not, and all Frenchmen and Scottes that had maryed Englishe women, the wyfes & children had halfe the goodes deliuered vnto them, and euery denizen to finde suretie for his good abearyng, and all the other if they would be bayled to finde sureties for their truth and allegiaunce, or else to be kept in prison, for the portes were so kept that they could not flye.

The king nowe beyng entered into the warres, thought not to sleepe and let the French king alone, wherefore by his letters he commaunded certaine persons with their powers to come to London in August. They that were appoynted came accordyngly, euery man with such a number as to him was appoynted, and when they had mustered at London before the kinges Commissioners, they were nere. xij. thousand men with the Pyoners, and they were sent to the Lorde Admyrall which lay at Douer with foure thousand men, but because Haruest was not done, the vitaile at Calice was to little little for ſo great an armie, wherfore they lay in Kent at townes there a good ſpace, which made vitaile dere there.

In this Somner the Lorde Roſſe, and the Lorde Dacres of the north which were appoynted to keepe the borders agaynſt Scotland, did ſo valyauntly, that they burned the good towne of Kelſey, and.lxxx. villages and ouerthrew.xviij. towers of ſtone with all their Barnkyns or Bulwarkes.

The king alſo in this Moneth was credibly informed that the Duke of Albany prepared an army roiall of Scottes and Frenchmen to inuade England. Wherefore the king appoynted the Erle of Shrewſbury his Lorde Steward to be his Lieutenaunt generall agaynſt the ſayde Duke and hys inuaſions, which directed his letters to the ſhyres of Yorke, Darby, Staffford, Shropſhire, and all other beyonde Trent, that all men ſhoulde be in a readineſſe.

The. xx. day of Auguſt, the Cardinall ſent for the Maior, Aldermen, and the moſt ſubſtanciall Commoners of the Citie of London, where he declared to them that the king had appoynted Commiſſioners throughe the whole realme of England for to ſweare euery man of what value he is in moueables, the more to be in redineſſe for the defence of this realme. And the king for the loue he beareth you, would haue ſit with you himſelfe, but for certaine other affayres in his warres to be done is letted, and ſo hath appointed me your Commiſſioner. Wherefore in conuenient tyme certefie me the number of all ſuch as be worth one hundred poundes and vpward, to the entent I may ſweare them of their values: for firſt the king aſketh of you your louyng heartes and due obeyſaunce, the which ſhall appere by your conformitie to his requeſtes, and when the value is taken, he deſireth onely the tenth part of goodes and landes, which is the leaſt reaſonable thing that you can ayde your prince with. I think euery one of you wil offer no leſſe. As for the ſpiritualtie, euery man is in the ſhires ſworne, & ſhall and will gladly pay the fourth part to the king, and liue on the three partes. Nowe to your part I am ſure you will not grudge, therefore name me the men of ſubſtaunce, and for the meaner ſort, meaner Commiſſioners ſhal be appoynted. Sir (ſaid a Marchant) if it may pleaſe you, how ſhall this tenth part to the king be deliuered, in money, plate, or Iuelles? the Cardinall ſayde at a value. O my Lord ſayd the Aldermen, it is not yet two monethes ſithe the king had of the Citie. xx. M. pound in readie money in loane, whereby the Citie is very bare of money, for Gods ſake remember this, that riche Marchantes in ware be bare of money: Well ſayde the Cardinall, this muſt be done, and therefore go about it. So the Aldermen reſorted to their Wardes, and named ſuch as they iudged to be of that value, which came before the Cardinall, and moſte hũbly beſought him that they might not be ſworne for the true value of their ſubſtaunce for the true valuation to them was vnknowne, and many honeſt mennes credence was better then his ſubſtaunce, and therefore they doubted the perill of periurye. Well ſayde the Cardinall, ſithe you dread the crime of periury, it is a ſigne of grace, and therefore I will for you borow of the king a little. Make you your billes of your awne value, likely to report your fame, and then more buſineſſe needeth not: for you ſee what two coſtly armies the king hath ready agaynſt both Fraunce and Scotland, therefore nowe ſhewe your ſelues lyke louyng ſubiectes, for you be able ynough. And I dare swere the substance of London is no lesse worth then two Millions of golde. Then sayde the Citizens, we would to God that it were so, and the Citie to sore apaired by the great occupiyng of straungers. Well sayde the Cardinall it shall be redressed if I liue: But on Saterday next I shall appoynt one to receyue your Billes, and he that is of credence more then of substance, let him resort to me, and I will be secrete and good to him. Thus the Citizens departed in a great agony saiyng, that at the last loane summe lent the fift part, and now to haue the tent part was to much. And here note well that the .xx. thousand poundes that was lent, was not taken as the .xx. of euery mans substaunce, but it should be allowed as part of the tenth part, and this valuatiō should performe vp the whole tenth part. Great was ỳ mourning and murmuryng of the common people, as it is euer in suche cases of paymentes. But in the ende one Doctor Tonnys, a Secretary to the Cardinall, came to the Chapiter house of Paules, & to him the Citizens brought in their Billes, and on their honestie they were receiued, which halues afterward turned them to displeasure.

Had begot tenly repen taunce.

The Spiritualtie made sute to the Lord Cardinall, that no Temporal men should syt to examine them, to bee made priuie to their possessions and goodes: Wherefore Bishops and Abbots were appoynted Commissioners to take the value of their substaunce.

In this season was great plentie of vittaile sent to Calice, and to the Lorde Admyrall were sent Tentes, and Paullions, some of .lxx. lodgyngs for him and other noble men.

The Friday beyng the .xvij. day of August, certayne Welshmen were lodged at a pore village named Caule, because in Calice was verie narow lodging, and the same night foure hundred Frenchmen passed by Calice hauen for lack of good watche, and came into the same Village, and set fyre in the house where the Welshemen lay, which ranne away naked into the marishe and saued themselues, but their horses were taken. Thys chaunce happened for lack of good watch.

The Lorde Admyrall with a goodly company of souldiours entreth into Fraunce.

When the Lorde Admirall had brought all his men out of the shippes, and that all the souldiors were come out of Englande, and the ordinaunce set on lande, then came into Calice hauen .xiiij. ships out of Spaine from the Emperour, which set on lande three hundred Spanyardes, which were sent to serue the Lorde Admirall, and vnder him they were put. When all things were readie, the Lorde Admirall set in order his battayles, and for the forewarde he appointed syr Robert Ratclyffe Lorde Fitzwater, for Capitayne, and with him dyuers knightes and gentlemen, which Capitayne kept his men in verie good order.

After that battayle followed the ordinaunce, artilerie and other trusses with vittayle and all necessaries, and for the Capitayne of the horsemen was appointed syr Edward Guylford, by whome the currers and bewers of the Comtrey were appointed. The middle warde led the Lorde Admirall himselfe, and in his companie the Lord Edmond Haward his brother, with many worshipfull knightes, squires and tall yomen: The last battayle was led by two valyaunt knightes of the Garter, syr Wylliam Sandes, and syr Richard Wyngfield, and with them was sir Rychard Iernyngham with many other. In good order of battayle they passed ouer Newnam bridge the .xxx.

day of Auguſt to a place called Calkewell, and there lodged betweene the Wyndmill and the marriſhe.

The ſame day came to the Lord Admyrall a certayne number of wilde perſons, as men out of ſeruice and prentiſes that ran from their mayſters and other ydle perſons, and him deſired that they might be retayned in the kings wages, to whom he aunſwered that the king had appointed the number of ſuche as ſhould haue wages, which was fully complete, and aduiſed them to returne into England and not to loyter there. Then ſayde a tall yoman, my Lorde here be many good felowes, that with your fauour woulde ieopard to get or looſe, for their minde is to be reuenged on the Frenchmen, enemies to the king & his realme. Good felow ſayd the Lord Admirall, their myndes be good, but if for lack of conduyte they ſhould be caſt away, it were a loſſe to the king, and a great courage to the French men. Then all the company cryed, let vs go in the name of God and ſaint George: then after counſaile taken, he gaue them a Penon of ſaint George and bad them aduenture (of which they were called aduenturers) and farther bad them that if they got any bootie they ſhould euer bring it to the armie, and they ſhould be payde to the vttermoſt, and then he gaue them money and commaunded them weapons and ſo the ſayde.xxij. daye, the ſayde aduenturers foure hundred in number and mo, ſet forward before the hoſte, but howe they did, you ſhall heare afterwarde. Aduentures.

Monday the firſt day of September the armie remoued toward Guiſnes, which day was verie hote and drinke lacked, and water was not nere, ſo that ſome dyed for faintneſſe, and thys night they lay at Guyſnes.

Tueſday the ſecond day of September the armie paſſed toward Arde: And in the golden Valey where the king of Englande and the French king met two yeres before, there met with the armie of England two Capitaines of the Burgonions, the one called the Erle of Egmond the Seneſchal of Henaude, and the Lorde of Bauers Admirall of Flaunders with fiue hundred horſemen, like men of warre. The Lorde Admirall in gentle maner receyued theſe two Capitaynes and their company, and ſo they ioyned themſelues to the Engliſhe armie, and the ſame daye they tooke lodging at Arde ſouth from the towne, where they were well vytayled, and there laye Wedneſday all day, and the Burgonions lay vnder the Caſtell of Mountorrey. The next daye they remooued to the Vale of Lyekes, and there encamped themſelues. Sir George Cobham the ſame day with two thouſand men, by the Admiralles commaundement came to the towne of Selloys, and ſet fyre in the towne, and when the towne was on fyre he aſſaulted the Caſtel. They within made reſiſtence, but it auayled not, for the walles were entered and the ſouldiours taken, and the caſtell ſet on fyre, and with Gunnepowder ouerthrew the walles: then with haſte he remoued to a towne called Brune bridge and ſet it on fyre, and alſo brent a towne called Senckerke, and alſo the townes of Botyngham and Wanſtier, and ſo returned to the Lorde Admirall which gaue him great thanks. The French men appered in plumpes, but yet they durſt not reſcue their townes.

On Saterday the Lorde Admirall remoued with the whole armie to a ground beſide ſaint Nerbyns, and there lay all Sunday, beyng the ſeuenth day of September, where he ſent diuers companies out, which forraged the Countreys and brent manye Villages as farre as they might trauaile: the Lorde Admirall caused the towne of Narbyn to be brent, and tooke the Castell and raced it and vtterly destroied it.

On Monday the.viij.day, he remooued to Dauerne and brent all the townes as he passed, and lying there he brent the towne of Dauerne, and cast downe the Castell of Columberge, and the castell Rew, but the Churches of Dauerne and a house of Nonnes were saued by his commaundemēt.

The same daye was brent Saint Marie de Boys and all the countrey twelue Mile about was of light fire, the people fled and left townes and Castels full of Wine, corne, and all other necessaries, so that in Dauerne the Englishemen founde great plentie, which or they went away they set a fire.

The.ix. day of September the whole armie came before the towne of Boyardes in the which was a Church more lyker a castell then a Church, for it was deepe dyched with drawe bridges and with Bulwarkes fortefied and lopes very warlike. The Admirall beholding it sayde, this is like no house of prayer. Then he commaunded his people to enter the dyches, and pluck downe the drawe bridges, and set fyre in the Church, and with Gunpouder ouerthrew it, and brent the towne and all the vilages adiacent to the same, the people cryed and fled, well was he that might saue himselfe.

The.x.day they came to the towne of Vaus, which was nighe the towne called Foucamberge, and there a company of Frenchmen were aspied, for out of a wood they shewed themselues, but they taried not long, but without profer of encounter they departed. Wherefore the whole armie tooke their campe, and there lay til the.xiij. day which was Saterday, euery day sending plumpes out to set fyre in the Country, and on that day they tooke the waye to Frynge or Frynges, and there brent the towne and destroyed the Castell which was very strong.

The Sonday beyng the.xiiij. daye, the Lorde Admirall with his company in great rayne and yll weather passed by hilles and valeys verie painefully, and with great labor came to a towne called Blamow, and there taried Monday all day, and there all daye counsayled the Capitaynes both of England and Flaunders or Burgoyn, what was best to be done.

Message frō Hedyng.

On Tuesday in the morning came a Trumpet from the Castell of Hedyng and desired to speake with the Capitayne, which incontinent sent for him: my Lorde Capitayne sayde the Trumpet, the Capitayne of Hedyng desireth you to come thether and see the place, and on the walles he will bring you good luck, and he prayeth you not to hurt the Dere in his Parke, and for any other hurt you can doe him he careth not: well sayde the Lorde Admirall, I will send him aunswere by my Trumpet. Incontinent he called a Trumpet, and bad him go to Hedyng to Mounsire de Bees, and to say to him that he will come to the Castell of Hedyng, and if he slaye any of my men with his artilerie, let him trust me, that if I get the Castell, I will saue neyther man, woman, nor childe. So with that message the Trumpet departed and declared it to Mounsire de Bees, which sayde that it was spoken of noble courage, and so the Trumpet returned, and the same daye the campe was remooued and the whole armie came about the Castell of Hedyng, at which time the towne of Hedyng was sore infect with pestilence, wherefore a generall commaundement was geuen, that no man should once come into into the towne, howbeit some of the Burgonions did set fire in the houses.

When the siege was planted, the ordinaunce was verye light for the wayes were so deepe and the ground so wet, that the great ordinaunce could not be caried. This thing was well debated by the Lorde Admirall and the Capitaynes. After they had bene there a. xj. dayes, first they considered that the Castel could not be obtayned without great ordinaunce, which in no wise could then be caryed, and also if they with the light ordynaunce shootyng shoulde spend all their pouder and not get the Castell, then in them might be reckened great foly, and also they should be in great ieopardie to passe without ordinaunce, and further the plague began sore in the armie, wherefore they determined to leaue the siege and returne. But whyle they laye at the towne, they beate downe roffes, galleries, chimneis, & such other things as the light ordinance would beate downe, which sore defaced the beautie of the Castell. They also destroyed all the Dere in the Parke, which were fallowe Dere, and left none for the Capitaine. The English men were clerely determined to haue assauted the Castel, if the Burgonions would haue done the same: but they refused, which seyng the Englishemen left the assault alone: For though the Englishe men had gotten it, it should haue bene deliuered to the Emperors vse by the treaty, for he claymed it as his inheritaunce, which caused the Englishemen to leaue the assault.

The cause why the Castell was not assaulted.

And so the. xxij. daye of September they rered the siege and set themselues in good order of battayle and passed still onwarde, till they came to Dorlans, and brent the towne, and rased the castell, and from thence came to the good towne of Barrier and brent and spoyled the same. Thus he brent all the waye as he passed: and euer the weather was worse, and men fell sicke, wherefore the Burgonions and the Spaniardes returned into Flaunders about Betwyn.

The siege rayſed.

Then the Lorde Admyrall sawe that it was no time to keepe the fielde, turned backward in good order of battayle, and came to Calice the sixtene day of October. And whi'e he lay at Calice he sent out syr William Sandes, Sir Norice Barkeley, syr William Fitzwillyam with three thousand men, which brent Marguyson which was newly edified and fortefied, they brent also the towne of saint Johnes Rhode and Temple towne, and many Villages. At thys voyage were taken many prisoners. xiiij. M. sheepe. xiiij. C. great cattell, as Oxen and Kyen, and. xij. hundred Hogges, and seuen. C. Mares and horses, with thys great bootie thys crewe returned to Calice in safetie.

A great pity taken.

Then the Lorde Admirall sent syr John Walop with. ix. hundred men to saint Omers to lye there and at Guysnes, Hammes, and at Marke, and at Oy he left another number, and left Capitaynes to ouer see them, and all the Souldiours had a Monethes wages payde them, and so returned into Englande.

The aduenturers taried still and gat many good prayes, and brought to the garrisons, and lacked nothing: they were much drad of all the commō people, for of them they had great prayes, and daylie learned feates of warre which made them the bolder.

When the Lorde Admirall had set all things in an order on that side the sea, he toke ship and with the Nauy came into the ryuer of Thames, and so to the king, of whome he was well welcommed and not vnworthy.

Scottes banished the realme.

In thys season were banished out of Southwarke twelue Scottes, which had dwelt there a long season, and were conueyed from parishe to parishe by the Constable lyke men that had abiured the realme, and on their vttermost garment a whyte Crosse before and another behinde them. Thus were they conueyed through London North warde, tyll they came to Scotlande.

Whyle the Lorde Admirall was thus in Fraunce destroiyng the countrey, the noble Erle of Shrewsburie Lorde George Talbot, and Steward of the kings houshold prepared by the kings commaundement a great armie towarde Scotland: for the king was enformed that Duke John of Albany (which in the parliament of Scotland was made Lorde gouernour of the realme, and of the yong king during his nonage) had rayſed a mightie and puyſſaunt hoste of Scottes, to the number of foure score thousand men, as after was well knowne, which were warlike appointed, and that he with fiue hundred Frenchmen with hand Gunnes and other great artillerie was cõming forward to inuade the west marches of England adioyning toward Scotlande. Wherefore the king sent worde to the Erle of Shrewsburie, which with all diligence like a noble Capitaine set forward towarde Yorke, and wrote to the Erles of Northumberland, Westmerland and Darby, to the Lorde Dacres, Lumley, Clyfford, Scrope, Latemer, Ogle, Darcy, Conyers, and to all other gentlemen, to be readie within eyght houres warnyng with all their powers, and so in iorniyng, he with his power which was great, came to the Citie of Yorke abyding the ordinaunce and the Lordes, and all other things necessarie in such a case.

In the meane season, the Scottes were come nigh to the Citie of Carleyle & lodged them nigh the water of Eske, not farre from Sulway sandes, and there made their abode. The Erle of Westmerland, the lord Dacres, the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Mountaigle, with the knightes of Lancashire, Westmerland, and Cumberland, were readie with. xxbiij. thousande men to haue geuen them battaile.

When the Scottes sawe that they could not enter into England without battaile, the Lordes of Scotland drew to counsaile, and amongest all one wise man sayde, my Lordes, hether we be come by the commaundement of my Lorde Gouernour the Duke of Albany, but for what cause the warre is we should knowe: you all remember that the last warre was to the realme of Scotlande much preiudiciall: For king James the fourth brought the realme of Scotlande to the best that euer it was: and by his warre it was brought to the worst almost that may be, for by that warre was he and hys nobilitie slaine, which Scotland sore lamenteth: Wherefore by mine aduice let vs go to the Duke, and knowe of him the cause. Then they all came to the Dukes Court, and the Erle of Arrayn an auncient man spake for them all and sayde, my Lorde Gouernor, by your will and commaundement here is assembled almost all the Nobilitie of Scotland with their power vpon a pretence to enter into England, my Lordes here would know the cause and quarell why this warre is begon, if it might please your goodnesse, it should well satisfie their mindes.

bene demaunded or nowe: For well you knowe that I for the bery loue that I bere to the realme of Scotland, of the which I haue my name, honor and lynage. I haue passed the seas out of the noble realme of Fraunce into thys realme of Scotland. One great cause to bring you to a vnity when you were in deuision: By reason of which deuision your realme was likely to be conquered and destroyed. Also the French king by my suptes and intercession will ioyne with you in ayde against the Englishe Nation: And when thys warre was determined in the Parliament, you made me Capitaine, authorisyng me to inuade England with banner displayed: then was no question demaunded of the right or quarel, & that that I haue done is by your assent & agreement, and that I will iustifie: but to answere your demaund, me thinke that you haue iust cause to inuade England with fyre, sworde, and blood, if you be not to forgetfull, and without you will beare dishonour and reproche for euer: For you knowe that this realme of Scotland is our inheritaunce as a porcion of the worlde allotted to our nacion and auncetors whome we succede: Then where may be better warre then to maintaine this our naturall inheritaunce: is not dayly sene the great inuasions that the Englishe men on vs make, the great manslaughters, and murders, with robberies, and spoyles that they doe dayly? Is not this a cause of warre? To defende the Countrey is the office of a king, the honour of noble men, and the very seruice of chiualrie, and the duetie naturall of the commonaltie. For I thinke it a iust quarell if we might conquer the realme of England and anner it to our realme and make a Monarchie: For sith the beginnyng of our habitation in this Isle of Britayne, that nation and we haue bene enemyes, and vs they haue euer hated, and yet we haue withstood them till at the last battayle of Bannston, where we vnchaunce lost our souereigne Lorde, and many noble men, but that was by treason of his Lord Chamberleyn, and yet I thinke we wanne the field: which murther I think al we noble men ought to reuenge. Therefore I would that ye should couragiously aduaunce your selfe in thys quarell to get honour and to be reuenged.

The answere of the Duke of Albany.

Then a sad man called the Presidēt of the counsaile sayde, my Lorde, Fortune of warre is led by hym that all leadeth, and he striketh the stroke, we can worke no miracles, and here are the Lordes of Englande readye to encounter vs, and suerly they will fight, for their power shal encrease daily and ours is at the hyest. And if God geue vs ꝑ victory as I trust he wil, yet haue we not wonne the field: For ready cōming is the Lorde Talbot Erle of Shrewesbury so much dred in Fraunce as you know well, with a great puissaunt army, and there is no doubt but the king of Englande will send or bring an other army, yf we should chaunce to get the first battaile: if we get the second fielde that will not be without the losse of many nobles, by reason wherof the realm shalbe weaker. And if we be ouercome how many shal be slaine God knoweth: They that flee ar worthy to be reputed as traytors to the king and so by wilfulnesse and foolish hardinesse the realme shall be in ieoperdy to be vndone, and I say while the king is within age, we ought to moue no warre, sith by warre we may bring him to destruction. Alas sayde the Duke here is all the puyssaunce of Scotlande: if we retourne we shall encorage our enemies, and the realme of Scotlande shall euer be rebuked and defamed. All this communication in counsaile was written by one syr

Lother

Lother Priest and Scot and Secretary to the Queene of Scots, which was a Secretary there in the host at that time, to a Scottishe Priest that dwelt in London: and farther he wrote that the Scottish king did much for the French kings pleasure to draw the Lords of England with their powers toward the partie and to put the king of Englande to charges, so that he should not inuade Fraunce.

After this communication, the Queene of Scottes which doubted the sequele of this matter, sent worde to the Duke, and him required to common of a peace with the warden of the English Marches, which sent an Herauld to the Lorde Daker then warden of the west Marches, the Lorde Daker agreed, and vpon hostages went to the Duke of Albanye into his campe, where the Queene of Scottes by that tyme was come, and so there was an abstinence of warre taken for a season: and in the meane tyme the Duke and the Queene promised to send Ambassadors to the king of Englande to conclude a peace: And thus the Scottes returned into their houses. Thys truce was taken the. xj. day of September betweene Englande and Scotland, this. xiiij. yere of the king. The Erle of Shrewsbury heeryng of the truce by the Lorde Dacres letters, returned with all his companie, sory that he had not gone forward on the Scottes. In this season the Commissioners sate for the loane of the tenth part of euery mans substance in euery shire, the people were sworne and some aduaunced themselues more then they were worth of pride, not remembring what was commyng, and the Commissioners did what they coulde to set the people to the vttermost, which afterward turned the people to much heauinesse, and by reason of this great summes of money were leuyed, but the most part were not content, because the loane was so sodainly payed. But vnder the value of. v. pound no man lent a peny.

The warre thus continuyng betwene the French king and the king of England, there was a valiaunt Capitaine Constable of the Castell of Hemmes vnder the Lord Mountioy called sir Richard Whethill, the Frenchmen him somuch hated, that they deuised a policye to take him, and so on Christmasse day at night there issued out of Bulleyn two hundred horsemen, and three hundred footemen, and so much they trauayled that altogether were come to a place where Hoppes grew, nere Hammes Castell called Cat Hal. When they were come thether, they kept themselues couert, and in the morning they brake by the Turne pyke by Saint Gertrudes: Then sent they into Hammes Marshe. ix. or. x. footemen to take Cattell. In the Castell the alarme rang, but the embushement kept them still close: The Constable perceyued what the alarme ment, and armed him, and so did his archers and tooke his horse, and three Gentlemen went on foote by him. The Frenchmen of purpose driued the Cattell here and there, as though it would not be driuen, sir Richard Whithill pursued them. When the driuers sawe him, they droue the Cattel into a great fielde: then were the bushement of horsemen and footemen betwene them and Saint Gertrudes, and they sodainly brake out on them, and the three Gentlemen on foote fought valiauntly, but they were slaine, the knight alighted and fought on foote manfully, but he was borne downe with Pykes, and sore wounded, and so was compelled to yelde himselfe prisoner: by that tyme were. xxx. archers come out of the Castell, and when they sawe the great number of the Frenchmen, then they knewe

that

that their Capitaine was betrayed, and so returned.

The duke of Albany returned.

About this time the Duke of Albany sailed out of Scotlande into Fraunce, and the French king so much fauored hym, that as it was shewed to the king of England for truth, that when the French king rode through Parys he roade on the one hand and Richard de la Polle a Traytor to England and by parliament attaynted on the other hande, and that the Duke had asked of the French king fiue thousand horsmen and ten thousand Almaynes, and that he had promised the French king that if he had those .xv. thousand men, he woulde doe one of these three things, eyther slay the king of England in battaple, or else take him prisoner, or else driue him out of his realme. These were shamefull bragges of a noble man and very foolish.

Ambassade from Scotlande.

Ye haue heard before how truce was taken by the Duke of Albany and the Lorde Dacres for a season betwene Englande and Scotland, and that Imbassadours should be sent to the king of England, so it was that in October according to their accustomed doubleneſſe they sent three personages of small behauior as it seemed, as Imbassadours from Scotlande: they were finally regarded and shortly departed. There commission was to know whether the same tyme or abstinence of warre was by the king assented to or not, and other Commission had they none. Thus they ment craftily as you may perceyue, for in such troublous tyme they may steale vnpunished, which they may not do in tyme of peace. Wherefore the king to be sure of them sent for Henry the fift Erle of Northumberland, and him made warden of the whole Marches, which thankfully accepted the same, and so departed Lorde warden. But howsoeuer it happened he made suyte to the king and his Counsail and neuer left, till he was discharged of the same, & then the Erle of Surrey Lorde Admirall of England was made generall warden, and the Lord Marques Dorset was made warden of the East Marches and middle, and the Lorde Dacres of the West Marches: which three Lordes spedde them thether the sixt day of Marche for the defence of the Borders. For refusyng of this office the Erle of Northumberland was not regarded of his awne Tenauntes, which disdeyned him and his blood, and much lamented his folye, all men esteemed him without heart, or loue of honour and chiualrie.

The loane gathered.

The king out of hand sent Commissioners to gather the loane, this was called the practisyng of the loane, which sore emptied mens purses. In the same moneth were musters taken through the realme, and euery man commaunded to be readie within a dayes warnyng to do the king seruice in harneſſe, which caused euery man of honestie to by harneſſe and weapon.

A roade made into Scotland by the Englishmen

The Lorde Marques Dorset warden of the East Marches betweene England and Scotland, accompanied with sir William Bulmer, and sir Arthur Darcie, and many other noble men, the second day of Aprill, then beyng there Thursday, entred into Tiuedale, and so ten myle into Galoway, and brent on euery syde townes and villages, and the Scottes in great number shewed themselues on the hilles, and did not approch, and so he all that night tarryed in the Scottish ground, and on good Fryday returned with their boty which was foure thousand head of nete into England, when they had brent Grymslay, Mowhouse, Dufford mylles Ackeforth, Crowlyng, Nowes maner, Widder Crowlyng, Harbottell, Low Bog, Seffordth Maner, Widdyl rigge, Primsed, Broket, Shawes Haruel, wide open Haught, and other townes townes and billages, and yet loſt not many men.

A parliamẽt. The.xb. day of Aprill began a Parliament at the blacke Friers in Lõdon, and that day the maſſe of the holy ghoſt was ſong, all the Lordes beyng preſent in their Parliament robes. And when Maſſe was finiſhed the king came into the Parliament Chamber and there ſate downe in the ſeate royall or throne, and at his feete on the right ſyde ſat the Cardinall of Yorke, and the Archbiſhop of Caumtorbury, and at the raile behinde ſtood Doctor Tunſtall Biſhop of London, which made to the whole parliament an eloquent oratiõ, declaryng to the people the office of a king. Firſt he muſt be a man of iudgement, according to the ſayng of ỹ prophet Dauid Deus iudicium tuum regi da. &c. Alſo he muſt be a man of great learning, according to the ſayng of the Prophete. Erudimini qui iudicatis terram. Accordyng to which ſaynges, he ſayde that God had ſent vs a prince of great iudgement, of great learnyng, & great experience, which accordyng to his princely dutie forgat not to ſtudie to ſette forwarde all thinges which might be profitable to his people and Realme, leaſt there might be layde to his charge the ſayng of Seneca. Es rex & non habes tempus eſſe rex? Art thou a king and haſt no tyme to be a king? which is aſmuch to ſay, as art thou a king, and doeſt nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king and ſeeſt the people haue an inſufficient lawe? Art thou a king and wilt not prouide remedie for the miſchiefe of thy people? Theſe things haue moued the kinges highneſſe to call this his high Court of Parliament both for the remedie of miſchiefes which be in the common lawe, as recouerpes, forraine vouchers, and corrupt tryals. And for makyng and orderyng of newe eſtatutes which may be to the highe aduauncement of the common wealth, wherefore he willeth the Commons to repayre to the common houſe, and there to elect them a ſpeaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the Lorde Chauncelor of the ſame, which ſhould thereof make report to the kinges moſt noble grace, which ſhoulde declare his pleaſure when he would haue him preſented before his perſon. This was the cauſe of the parliament he ſayd, but ſurely of theſe things no word was ſpoken in the whole Parliament, and in effect no good act made, except the graunt of a great ſubſidie were one, but accordyng to this inſtruction the Commons departed to the common houſe, and choſe for their ſpeaker Sir Thomas Moore knight and preſented him the Saterday after in the Parliament Chamber, where he accordyng to the old vſage diſabled himſelfe both in witte, learnyng, and diſcretion, to ſpeake before the king, and brought in for his purpoſe how one Phormio deſyred Hanniball to come to his readyng, which thereto aſſented, and when Hanniball was come, he began to reade, de re militari, that is of Chiualrie: When Hannibal perceyued him, he called him arrogant foole, becauſe he woulde preſume to teache him which was maiſter of Chiualrie, in the feates of warre. So the ſpeaker ſayde, if he ſhould ſpeake before the king of learnyng, and orderyng of a common welth and ſuche other lyke, the king beyng ſo well learned, and of ſuch prudence and experience, might ſay to him as Hanniball ſayd to Phormio. Wherfore, he deſired his grace that the commons might chooſe them another ſpeaker: the Cardinal anſwered, that the king knewe his wit, learnyng and diſcretion, by long experience in his ſeruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had choſen him as the moſt meeteſt of all, and ſo he did admit him. Then ſir Thomas Moore gaue to the king his moſt humble thankes, and deſyred of him two peticions: the one if he ſhould be ſent from the Commons to the king on meſſage, and miſtake their entent, that he might with the kinges pleaſure reſort agayne to the Commons, for the knowledge of theyr true meanyng: the other was, if in communication and reaſonyng any man in the common houſe ſhould ſpeake more largely then of dutie he ought to do, that all ſuch offences ſhould be pardoned, and that to be entered of record, which two peticions were graunted, and ſo thus began the Parliament and continued as you ſhall here.

Becauſe an euill chaunce happened to the great rebuke of all Chriſten Princes, I entend briefly to declare the ſame miſerable chaunce. In the beginnyng of this yere Sultan Solyman Pac called the great Turke, which was but the .viij. of the ligne of Ottoman, the firſt that tooke vpon him to be a great Capitaine or ruler. And to whome Sultan Solyme his father had loſt the Empyres of Conſtantinople, Trapeſonde, Alexandry, and Babilon, with many diuers kingdomes and realmes: which Sultan Solymon the yere before had gotten the towne of Belgrado beyng the key of Hungary. Becauſe he ſawe all the great Princes in Chriſtendome nowe at diſcorde, thought it moſt for his honor and profite to make warre on the Iſle of the Rhodes, and to take the ſame, which Iſle had bene kept by the ſpace of two hundred.xiiij.yeres by the brethren or knightes of the order of Saint Johnes of Jeruſalem. Diuers thinges moued him to take this enterprice. One was becauſe this Iſle ſtoode ſo that the religious of the ſame oftentymes tooke and deſtroyed his ſhippes as they came with golde and other riches from Egipt, Syrie and other ỹ Eaſt parties to Conſtantinople, ſo that by them of that Iſle he ſuſtayned more hurt then by all Chriſtendome, becauſe the ſayd Iſle ſtood in the entry toward Conſtantinople. Another motion was, becauſe his father when he dyed charged him to aſſay to take the Rhodes for to be reuenged of the ſhame that they had done to his graundfather Mahomet the great Turke which was with diſhonour beaten from the ſiege of the Rhodes. But the greateſt occaſion of all was, the exhortation of a great Counſaylor of the religion called Andrew Admyrall borne in Portyngale, which knewe the whole eſtate and in what caſe the towne ſtoode in: The cauſe why this Andrew Admirall bare malice to his religion, was becauſe after the death of Frier Fabrica de Laretto Lord maiſter of their religion, he was not elected to that honour, but one Philip de Vyllyars de Liſle Adam of Fraunce was named to be Lord Mayſter, wherefore the ſayd Andrew prouoked the Turke to come to the Rhodes.

Why the Turke coueted the Rhodes.

The great Turke ſeyng ſo great an occaſion offered and deſiring honor and alſo knowing the fortreſſe of the Rhodes to lacke munitions (for ſurely the brethren of the ſayd order were both of ſuch welth and pride, and alſo lyued after ſuch an vngratious and vngodly faſhion, that they neyther tooke heede of their vow and ſolempne Profeſſion, nor alſo did foreſee the thing to come, ſo that the great wealth of them, and their euill liuing blinded them that they thought the Turke durſt not once attempt to ſet on their garriſō, and ſo they being eleuate in this poynt of pride, left their towne vnfurniſhed and were ſodaynly ſurpryſed (as you ſhall heere) wherefore the ſayde Turke couertly prouided for thre hundred ſayle, in the which he caryed all his artillary and all other thinges neceſſary: in the which army were .lx. thouſande

Myners

Myners and Pyoners prepared for the only intent to digge and mine: al the rest of the armye of the Turke came by lande to a place called Fisco, which standeth so directly agaynst the Rhodes, that a fyer may be seene from the one side to the other, from which place the Turke sent letters to the above named Phillipe de Vylliers Lord Maister of the sayde religion, signifying to hym that he woulde haue the sayde Isle for the great damage that they had done to him and to his people, and if they woulde yelde to him the sayd Isle, he promised on his fayth and by Mahomet his first Prophet, they should haue no damnage nor hurt by him, and that they that would depart shoulde goe in safetie, and they that would tary and serue him should haue good wages, and if they refused this to doe, he sware that he would subuert the walles of their fortresse and destroye them all and make them slaues, which letter was dated at Constantinople the first day of June. The sayde Lorde Maister and his company were greatly abashed of this letter, but yet like hardy Gentelmen they intended to defende them, and made all the preparations that they could do in so short a space, and wrote to al Princes christen of their neede and distresse. But the Turke like a wily serpent knowing the great deuision amongest the Christen Princes, so that he knew that they could send no succors to the Rhodes, sent two hundred. M. Turkes which arriued in the Isle of the Rhodes on Midsomer day which was the feastfull day of the Rhodians in honor of saint John Baptist, which sodaine comming sore abashed the Rhodyans being but fiue hundred knights and .v. M. other meete to beare armes: yet of noble courage and trusting in God, they determined to defend the enemies of God, and the .xxviij. daye of July the Turke arriued there in his owne person, which much encouraged his people.

The Turkes letter.

When the Turke was arriued, he bent his ordinance toward the towne and did no great harme, when he saw that the walles were of that defence that ordinaunce did litle harme, he caused all his Pyoners to cast yearth one banke ouer another styl, tyll they came within a bowshot of the wall. And although that many of the pyoners were slayne with ordinaunce of the towne they neuer ceased till they had made a banke of yerth higher by ten foote then the wall of the towne, and they there laide their ordinaunce, so that no person durst stirre on the walles or Bulwarkes, & thus with mountaynes of earth was the towne enuironed, and behinde the mountaynes laye the Bassaus and chiefe Capitaines of the Turke which were euer ready to take their aduauntage, and dayly did shote into the towne and bet downe houses, and slew the people in the streates, for they vpon this mount might easily see into the towne. Beside this, the Turke caused so many mynes to be made in diuers places, that they within, were not able to make countermynes for lacke of people, in so muche as women were set at worke to digge and carye, by reason whereof a great part of the walles were ouerthrowne. And if they within had not made countermynes, the towne had bene gotten within a short space. Also the Turkes in September gaue to the Rhodyans foure great assaultes like valiaunt warriers, but the Christen men within, so valiantly defended them, that at euery assault they lost at the least two thousand men, and at the fourth assault they lost ten thousand Turkes and more.

The assaultes

The great Turke seyng the losse of his men at the assaultes, sent for Mustaphaph Bashaw, through whose counsayle he toke on him this enterprice and much blamed him that he made him beleue that he might haue the

towne within .xij. dayes or in a moneth at the moſt, wherefore in that furye he woulde haue put him to death, if the other Baſſhawes had not intreated for hym: but in concluſion the Turke determined clerely to raiſe his ſiege and to depart, and ſo had done if that ſame night ſyr Andrewe Admyrall that you haue heard of before and a Jew being within the Rhodes had not written letters and ſhot them out on quarrels into the Turkes army. By which letters the Turkes knew the neceſſitie of the towne and febleneſſe of the people, which cauſed him to chaunge his purpoſe. But this treaſon was eſpyed, and the Traytors taken and put to terrible execution, and the Turke cauſed ſo many mynes to be made, that although ſome tooke none effect, yet by ſome he ouerthrew both bulwarkes, walles and towers, ſo that he might enter into the towne: and ſo on ſaint Andrewes euen he cauſed a great aſſault to be geuen, which was very fierce, but yet the Chriſten men ſo valyauntly defended them that they ſlew thre thouſand Turkes and mo, and kept them from entring that day, but the Citizens of the Rhodes after this aſſault came to the Lord Maiſter, and prayed him to haue compaſſion of them, their wyfes and children, and ſhewed him that if the towne were taken by aſſault (as it was like to be) that they all ſhould be cruelly murdered, the Lorde Maiſter much regarded his honor, and comforted the people with fayre words, but by chaunce about the ſame time the great Turke ſent a letter into the Rhodes, willing them to deliuer the towne, and they al ſhould haue their liues and goodes, and they that would tary ſhould tary in quiet, and they that woulde depart, ſhould ſafely depart.

Treaſon eſpied.

When this letter was knowne, then the people cryed out on the Lord Maiſter, to take the offer, wherefore he calling all hys counſayle together, ſeyng that it was not poſſible to keepe the towne longer, both for lack of artillarie and vittayle, and alſo becauſe his number was ſo miniſhed, that ſcarce he had Souldiours to keepe the walles: wherefore he by great aduiſe determined to take the Turkes offer, and ſo ſent to hym two of hys religion, for the farther concluſion and aſſuraunce of the ſame, which wel entertayned them, and had wrytings ſealed of all thinges that they deſired, to which two knightes. Aymeche Baſſhaw ſware by hys fayth that there was ſlayne at the ſiege .lxiiij. M. Turkes, and .xl. thouſand dead of mortalitie and mo.

The yeelding vp of the Rhodes.

And ſo on Chriſtmas daye, the great Turke himſelfe entered into the Rhodes, and tooke poſſeſſion thereof, and the Lorde Maiſter and all his religion, the firſt day of January tooke ſhip and ſayled to Candy, and ſo in concluſion came to Rome, and there declared hys chaunce and aduenture. Thus was the towne and the Iſle of the Rhodes taken by the great Turke, which was a great ſuccour to all chriſtian men, reſorting into the Eaſt parts of the worlde, which chaunce was much lamented thorow all chriſtendome, and muche blame put in all Princes, becauſe they ſent no ſuccour nor ayde to the Iſle.

And thys yere the Byſhop of Dureſme died, and the king gaue the ſayd Byſhoprike to the Cardinall, and he reſigned the Biſhoprike of Bathe, to Doctor John Clerke maiſter of the Rolles, and he made ſyr Henry Marney his Vicechamberleyn Lorde priuie ſeale, and after created him Lorde Marney. In the ende of thys yere, Doctor Blithe Biſhop of Cheſter, was attached for treaſon, but he quyted himſelfe. And about thys ſeaſon, the Cardinall of Yorke beyng Legate, proued Testaments, and did call before him all the executors & administrators of euery Dioces within the realme, so that the Bishops and ordinaries, did proue no great willes in their Dioces, except he were compounded with, not to their little disauauntage. Also by his power Legantine he gaue awaye all the yerely profites of benefices belonging to spirituall persons, by the which doing, he not onely had the hatred of the spiritualty, but also he ranne into the daunger of the Premunire, which he sore after repented, as it shall appere in the. xxj. yere of this king.

The Court Legantine.

1523 / 15

The Parliament beyng begon, as you haue heard before reherſed, the Cardinall accompanied with dyuers Lordes, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the temporaltie, came the. xxix. day of Aprill into the common house, where he eloquently declared to the commons, how the French king Faunces, the first, called the most christened king, had so often times broken promise with the king of Englande, and his welbeloued Nephew Charles the Emperor, that the king of his honor could no longer suffer. For first he declared, that the meeting of the sayde two princes at Guysnes, the sayd French king was swore, to kepe all the articles conteyned in the tripartie league, made betwene him, the Emperour, and the king of Englande sithe the which time, he hath made warre on the Emperours dominions, by Robert de la March his Capitaine. He also hath withholden the tributes and other paimentes, whiche he should pay to the king of Englande, for redemption of Tournay and Tirwin, and not with this content, hath not alonely robbed and spoyled the kings subiectes, but also hath sent John Duke of Albany into Scotland to make warre and to inuade thys realme, wherefore the king of necessitie, was driuen to warre and defence, which in no wise could be maynteyned, without great summes of money, and he thought no lesse then eyght hundred thousand pounde, to be rayſed of the fift part of euerye mans goodes and landes, that is to say foure shillings of euery pounde, for he sayde that the yere followyng, the king and the Emperour should make such warre in Fraunce, as hath not bene sene.

The Cardinals oration.

A great subsidie.

After that he had declared his matter at length, exhorting the commons to ayde their prince, in time of necessitie, he departed out of the common house. The morrowe after, syr Thomas More beyng speaker, declared all the Cardinals oration agayne to the commons, and enforced his demaund strongly, saiyng: that of duetie men ought not to denie to pay foure shyllings of the pound. But for all that, it was denied and proued manifestly, that if the fift part of substaunce of the realme, were but eyght hundred thousand pound, and if men should pay to the king the fift part of their goodes, in money or plate it was prooued, that there was not so much money out of the kings handes, in all the realme, for the fift part of euery mans goodes, is not in money nor plate: For although fiue men were well monied, fiue thousand were not so, the Gentlemen of landes, hath not the fift part of the value in coyne: the Marchaunt that is riche of Silke, Wolle, Tynne, Cloth, and such Marchaundise, hath not the fift part in money, the husbande man is riche in corne and cattle, yet he lacketh of that somme. Like wise victaylers and al other artificers, be rich in houshold stuffe, and not in money: and then consequently, if all the money were brought to the kings handes, then men must barter cloth for victayle, and bread for cheese, and so one thing for another:

ther: then consider that after this valuation, the king hath had by the waye of loane two shillings of the pound, which is foure hundred thousand pound, and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, which amounteth in the whole twelue hundreth thousand pound, which first and last is sixe shillings of the pounde, which is almost the thirde part of euery mans goods, which in coyne cannot be had within this realme, for the proofe whereof was alleged, that if there were in Englande, but fiftene thousand parishes, and euery parishe should geue a hundred Marke, that were but fiftene hundred thousande Marke, which is but ten hundred thousand pound, and how many parishes be in England one with another, able to spare a hundred Markes, out of Cities and townes: and where it is written, that in Englande there be. xl. thousand parishe Churches, it was proued that there were not .xiij. M. parishe Churches at this day. Then accompt the whole somme cannot amount aboue ten hundred thousand pound, and the king demaundeth eyght hundred thousand, and he according to this valuation, hath had foure hundred thousand pound, therfore it was thought, the somme was impossible to be leuied, and if all the coyne were in the kings handes, how should men lyue: Also the king had of the spirituall men the last yere, foure shillings of the pound.

After long reasoning there were certaine appointed, to declare the impossibilite of this demaunde to the Cardinall, which according to their commission, declared to him substantially the pouerty & scarcenesse of the realme: all which reasons and demonstrations, he little regarded, and then the sayde persons most meekely beseeched his grace, to moue the kings highnesse, to be content with a more easier somme, to the which he curtishly aunswered, that he would rather haue his tongue plucked out of his head with a payre of pinsons, then to moue the king to take anye lesse somme: with which answere, they almost dismayed, came and made report to the common house, where euery day was reasoning, but nothing concluded.

Wherefore the Cardinall came againe to the common house and desired to be reasoned withall, to whom it was answered, that the fashion of the nether house was, to heare and not to reason, but among themselues. Then he shewed the realme to be of great ryches, first because the kinges customes were greater nowe, then they were before time: also he alleged sumptuous buyldings, plate, riche apparell, of men, women, children, and seruauntes, fat feastes, and delicate dishes, which things were all tokens of great abundaunce: with which repeting of mens substaunce, as though he had repined or disdayned, that any man should farewell, or be well clothed but hymselfe, the commons greatly grudged. And when he was departed out of the house, it was proued, that honest apparell of the commodities of this realme, abundance of plate, and honest viandes, were profitable to the realme, and not prodigall. After long debating, the commons concluded to graunt two shillings of the pounde, of euery mans landes or goods, that was worth twentie pound, or might dispend twentie pound to be taken for the king and so vpwarde of euerie twentie shillings, two shillings, and from. xl. shillings to twentie pound, of euery twentie shillings, twelue pence, and vnder. xl. shillings of euery head. xvj. yeres and vpward foure pence, to be payde in two yeres. This graunt was reported to the Cardinall, which therewith was sore discontent, and sayde, that the Lordes had graunted foure shyllings of the pound, which was proued vntrue, for in deede they had graunted nothing, but harkened all vpon the commons.

A franke offer of a Gentleman.

Then a knight called syr John Hussye of Lincolnshire, sayde, to please the Cardinall somewhat, let vs gentlemen of fiftie pounde lande and vpwardes, geue to the king of our landes twelue pence of the pounde, to be payde in three yere: with which motion diuers gentlemen were sore discontent. And when the question was asked, ten or twelue of the Gentlemen said yea, and when the nay should be asked, the commons sayd nothyng, for they would not condempne, nor let the Gentlemen to charge themselues, and so by ten or twelue persons, the gentlemen were burdened, with twelue pence more then other, for the which graunt, syr John Hussye had much euill will.

After thys graunt made, the .xxj. day of May, because of Whitsontyde, the Parliament was prorogued to the tenth daye of June: During which prorogation, the common people sayde to the Burgesses, Sirs, we heare say you will graunt foure shillings of the pound, we aduise you to doe so that you may go home, with many euill wordes and threatnings.

And in this season, the Cardinall by his power Legantine, dissolued the Conuocation at Paules, called by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and called him and all the clergy, to his Conuocation to Westminster, which was neuer sene before in England, wherof maister Skelton a mery Poet wrote.

Skelton.

Gentle Paule lay dowyne thy Sweard:
For Peter of VVestminster hath shauen thy Beard.

When the parliament was begunne againe, the landed men of fiftie pounde and vpwarde, seyng that they were charged, with twelue pence of euery pound of their landes, moued that all such as were worth fiftie pound in goods and vpwarde, should pay also twelue pence of the pound, in the fourth yere. At the which motion was much reasoning, and at the last the .xxbij. daye of June, the question was asked, and doubtfull it was, whether the yea or nay were most, then was the house deuided, and all the commons seuered themselues, from the knightes of the sheeres, so that one yea part remayned onely in the knightes of the Shire, and the commons stiffely affirmed that the motioners of thys demaunde, were enemies to the realme. At the last the Speaker called them altogether, and after long perswading, and priuie labouring of friendes, it was agreed that twelue pence of the pound should be payde the fourth yere, of fiftie pounde in goodes.

After this the Parliament the .xxxj. day of July, was adiorned to Westminster, and there continued till the .xiij. day of August, and that day at. ix. of the clock in the night dissolued. During the time of this Parliament the xxbij. daye of Aprill, was syr Arthur Plantagenet, Bastarde sonne to king Edward the fourth, at Bridewell created Viscount Lisle, in the right of his wyfe, which was wife to Edmond Dudly beheadded.

Christian king of Denmarke.

This yere Christierne king of Denmarke with hys wyfe, which was sister to the Emperour Charles, and his three children, with .xbiij. shippes arriued in Flaunders, cleane banished out of his realmes and dominions, by hys Uncle Frederick Duke of Holst, and hys awne subiectes, for his cruelties as is written. Which Christierne with his wife, was well entertayned of the Duches of Sauoy, and a pencion assigned to him to liue on, in Brabant and Holland, During the time of his there soiorning, he made much sute to ome into England, to ſee and ſpeake with the king, which requeſt was to him graunted, and ſo he and hys Queene, with foure Gentlewomen, and a traine of fourtie perſons, poze and euill appareled, landed at Douer the.xv. day of June, where he was nobly receyued, by the Erle of Deuonſhire, and the Byſhops of Exceſter, and Rocheſter, and dyuers knightes and Eſquiers, and ſo brought to Greenewiche: where the king and Queene, ſtanding vnder their clothes of eſtate, receyued them into the great hall of Greenewiche. And he dyned with the king, and ſhe with the Queene, both ſet vnder the cloth of eſtate, and were ſumpteouſly ſerued of all delicate viands.

The king of Denmarkes comming into England.

And when he had ſoiourned there a ſeaſon, euery daye feaſted at the Court, he was conueyghed to London, and lodged at Bathe place, where he hearyng of the watch in London, on ſaint Peters euen, deſired to ſee it, and ſo was accompanyed with the Duke of Suffolke, the Erles of Oxford, Eſſex and Kent, and dyuers other Lozdes and Ladies, and brought into the kings head in Chepe, where the Citie of London made to him and hys wife a coſtly banquet. And when he had ſene the watch, he ſayd, I would to God I had ſo many archers, Pikes, and Halberders, as I ſawe this night, then I truſt I would puniſhe ſuche, as haue wrongfully diſpoſſeſſed me, of my realme and Country. And after he had ſolaced himſelfe in London, he reſorted to the king, of whome he had many great gifftes, and likewiſe had hys wyfe of the Queene her Aunt, and ſo tooke their leaue, and were conueyed to Douer. And when he had bene in England. xrij. dayes, he toke ſhipping, and ſayled agayne into Flaunders, prayſing much the king of Englande and hys Court.

Duryng all thys ſeaſon, and ſeſſion of the Parliament, the warre was fierce, both betweene England and Fraunce, and England and Scotland, in ſo much that eche part, did as much as in them lay, to hurt the other. For on the bozders of Scotland lay the valyaunt Erle of Surrey, great Admirall of Englande, and the Marques Dozſet, and hys three brethren, Syr Wylliam Compton, and ſir William Kyngſton, with dyuers other knightes and Eſquiers, ſent to them by the king, which daylie inuaded the realme of Scotlande, and threwe downe the Caſtell of Wedozberne, the Caſtell of Weſt Neſgate, the Caſtell of Blakkater, the Tower of Mackewalles, the tower of Eaſt Neſgate, and many other, and brent to the number of. xxxbij. villages, and haried the Countrey from the Eaſt Marches to the Weſt, and neuer had ſkirmiſhe: but they oftentimes ſhewed themſelues in plumpes, wayting their auauntage, howbeit in all thys iozney were fewe Engliſhe men loſt. Wherefoze the Lozdes perceyuing that the Scottes entended not to make any armie into England, foztefied the frontiers on euery part, with men and all things neceſſarie foz defence, foz ſtealing oz other ſmall rodes. After all which things ſet in a perfiteneſſe, they returned toward the king, and came to the ende of the Parliament.

Scotland ſoze haried and ſpoyled.

In this ſeaſon, the Frenchmen hauing a great deſire, to haue the kings towne of Calice, deuiſed firſt to deſtroy the hauen, by the which they ſuppoſed, that Calice might haue bene lightly gotten, foz fault of reſcue. Wherevpon they laded an olde Ship of foure hundzed Tonne, with great Cane ſtone, in the pozt of Deepe, which Ship had no Maſt, but came with a foze ſayle, as though the maſt had bene cut, and caſt ouer the boozd in the ſea in a tempeſt. And when thee came before Calice, euerye man that ſawe her, thought ſhe had bene weather driuen, and loſt her maſt by tempeſt, and ſo about ten of the clock at night the. xxiij. day of May, the ſayde Ship came before Calice hauen, as though ſhe would enter for harborow, and ſo was enterynge and miſſed the Chanell, and turned to the ſandes, towarde Ryſe banke, and the Frenchmen ſuppoſyng that they had bene in the very chanell, launched out their Boate, and ſodainly ſet the ſhip on fire, and lept into their Boate and ſo ſcaped by the ſhore. When they of Calice ſawe the fire, they were ſore troubled, and at the laſt when the water was gone, they perceyued the Shippe conſumed, and the goodly Caue ſtone lyeng whole.

Wherefore the Lorde Barnes Deputie of Calice, the Lorde Barkley Lieutenaunt of the Caſtell, the Lorde Sandes Treaſorer of Calice, and other commaunded all the laborers that might be gotten, to breake the remnaunt of the Shyp, and to carie awaye the ſtone, and ſo the ſayde ſtone was brought to Calice: wherevpon the ſayde Capitaynes ſent a letter, to the Capitaine of Bulleyne, by Calice purſuaunt at armes, deſiring him to geue thankes, to Mounſire Lodowyke Capitayne of Deepe, for the ſendyng of ſo fayre a Shyp, and goodly ſtone to Calice, which ſtone the ſayde Lordes ſent word, they had receyued into the towne of Calice, and that it did them much profite, for the fortification of the ſayde towne, deſiring him to ſend more, and they would receyue it on the ſame price. To the which letter, the Capitayne of Bulleyne anſwered, I haue nothing loſt, nor they haue nothing gotten of me, tell him that hath loſt, with which anſwere the Purſuaunt departed. Wherevpon the Engliſhemen beyng greeued, there iſſued out of Calice an hundred light men of warre, called auenturers, and came neere Bulleyn, and obteyned a great bootie, whereof the garriſon of Bulleyn beyng aduertiſed, iſſued out and folowed the Engliſhmen, and ſharply them encountered. The Engliſhemen ſhot ſo, that the French men which were fiue hundred, lighted and fought fore, ſo that as it appered euidently, that there were dead on the ground. xlvj. Frenchmen, and. xxij. Engliſhe men, and the Frenchmen tooke twentie Engliſhe men priſoners, the reſidue of the Engliſhe men kept them together, and ſo came to Calice, the Capitayne of thys enterpriſe was one Latheberie.

The Lorde Sandes Treſorer of Calice, entending to be reuenged on the Frenchmen, called the Counſayle of Calice to hym, and declared to them how the Frenchmen, and in eſpeciall Mounſire de Bees Capitaine of Bulleine, dayly imagined to deſtroy the Engliſh pale, and that they on the Engliſh part, had nothing done yet againſt them, wherefore he aduiſed them all to do ſome acte, and he himſelfe would be preſent, and formoſt man. Wherevpon it was concluded and commaunded, that euery man ſhoulde be in a readyneſſe, at the ſounding of a Trumpet, vpon which warning, the ſayde Lorde Sandes the ninth day of July earely in the morning, ſent forth two hundred light horſes, through the Engliſh pale, to ſtoppe the people from goyng, the one toward the other, leaſt his enterprice ſhould be aſcried, and ſo the people were kept in all that daye, and in the euening about ſeauen of the clocke, he himſelfe with a Capitayne called Guyot, Thomas Palmer, Ripton, Rafe Broke and other, ſet forwarde with light ordinaunce and vitayle, and embattayled themſelues in good aray, and marched toward Sandifield by a .xj. of the clock, and there refreshed them selues, and in good order, they came to the water of Sclaukes, not far from Bulleyn, which was the tenth day of July.

When they were ascryed A larme was rong all the country, and the Capitaine of Bulleyne sent forth .ixx. men of Armes, and foure hundred footemen with morrice pykes, Crosbowes, and hand gunnes, wherfore capitaine Gyot was sent with his bande of horsemen, to ayde the English footemen, which were farre behinde, and Capitaine Ripton, was appoynted to fight with the Frenchmen, and sir Thomas Palmer, and Rafe Broke, with the remnaunt of the horsemen, stode for a stale. Then Capitaine Ripton profered forwarde with the speres of Calice, and the Frenchmen came on valiantly, then began a sore skirmishe, the Frenchmen both horsemen and footemen, defended the passage at the water of Sclaukes, which is but a gut made by force of land water, but after long fight the Englishmen gat ouer the water by pure force, and tooke the Frenchmens standard, and a Gentleman which was a man of armes of Bulleine, called Charles de Maruiele, and euer Sir Thomas Palmer and Raufe Broke, stode and ayded where necessitie was most. Thus this skirmish continued from foure of the clocke in the morning, till nine of the clocke, before noone, and euer the Frenchmen encreased, but at the last they retreyted themselues toward Bulleyne, in which retourne diuers of them were slaine. Or the skirmish was ended, came the Lorde Sandes with the footemen, with his speare on his thigh, and his helme on his head, and greatly encoraged his company: during which conflict, diuers of Picardye had gathered them together, and had taken the church of Odirsaell, which was well fortefied, and a strong place: whereof the Lord Sands beyng aduertised, he marched thetherward, and in the way burned all that might be brent, and sent an officer at armes, to them that kept the churche of Odirsaell, to yelde the church to hym, which to hym aunswered that they would stand at defence: then he commaunded an assault, which quickely was done, and the Frenchmen defended themselues, with hande gonnes, Crosbowes, and pykes, so that the Englishmen could not enter. Then the Lorde Sandes commaunded a curtall, which he had with him, to be shotte to the church, and pierced it through: then they within saw that their defence could not holde, yelded themselues body and goodes. Out of the Church came lxvij. Frenchmen, which were taken as prisoners, and all the goodes which they had caried into the church were taken for a bootie. Thus by one of the clocke, the sayde tenth daye of July, was the church of Odirsaell taken.

In this while also, had the Frenchmen manned the steple of Odingham, which was a very strong Tower, much like a Castell, to whome the Lord Sandes sent an officer at armes, to commaunde them to yelde the fortresse, to whom they aunswered, that they were Frenchmen, and to him they would not yeelde, and if he came thether, they would withstande him: wherevpon he and his army marched thetherwarde, and about foure of the clocke at after noone, he assaulted the steple, and the Frenchmen themselues valiauntly defended, but sodainly by a chaunce vnknowne, the steple was a fier, and the Frenchmen fled downe to the quyer, then the Englishmen lightly entered the body of the church, and assaulted the Frenchmen, which cryed mercy and yelded themselues, and at twelue of the clocke at midnight the assault ended, and there were yelded out of the church foztie pziſoners.

After which time the Lozd Sandes encamped himſelfe, and made good watch foz feare of enimies, and in the mozning called to him all the Pzieſtes, which were in both churches, and ſtode at defence, and ſayd to them, that they ought not to be men of warre, & not withſtanding he had them as pziſoners, yet foz Gods ſake he releaſed them, admoniſhing them, that if euer after they were taken at defence, they ſhould be hanged on the next Galowes: after which monition done, he deliuered them freely.

Hardingham Caſtell brent and ſpoyled.

About eyght of the clocke in the mozning, he marched fozwarde in good ozder of battayle, and came to the Caſtell of Hardingham, the which he brent and ſpoyled, and ſo the .xj. day of July he and his company which paſſed not xij. hundzed men, of which he had loſt but only .xij. returned to Calice with great ſtoze of beſtyall and pyllage.

This ſame ſeaſon, the Frenche kyng ſent an armie of .xviij. thouſande men, towardes the parties of Flaunders, which ſecretly enterpziſed to take a place called Newdike, which is a ſtrong paſſage, betweene Fraunce and Flaunders, kept by the Fleminges, whereof they beyng aduertiſed, arrayſed a great power of .xij. thouſande and came to the paſſage, and ſlewe of the Frenchmen fyr hundzed: then the Frenchmen reculed, and ſeuered themſelues: ſome went to Mount Ozry, and ſome to Saint Omers, and ſome brent the Suburbes, they within Mount Ozry defended themſelues, and hurt the Capitaine of Bulleine, called Mounſire de Bees and ſlew his hoꝛſe: wherefoꝛe the Frenchmen went thence and brent a village called Arkus: thus was all the frontiers full of Frenchemen, in ſo much that in the moneth of Auguſt, they bette into the towne of Guyſnes, the ſcourers and the ſcoutwatch, whereof began Alarme, and the Frenchmen which were many in number, alighted as though they would geue aſſault mayntenaunt, and fierſly pzofered towarde the Ditches, but when the ozdinaunce beganne once to ſhote, it was no nede to bid them go. Then the Engliſhemen cozagiouſly folowed the chace, but ſodaynly out came an embuſchement of Frenchmen and tooke two Engliſhmen, and thus all the army of Fraunce, remoued to Gyngate beſide Tyzwyn.

The French king ſeeyng the king of England, dayly moze and moze encouraged to make warre on him and his dominions, and that the Scots did nothing to his pleaſure, foz lacke of the Duke John of Albany, whom the Scottes called their Gouernoz. He therefoze cauſed great pzeparation to be made on all parties foz men, Shippes, Harneſſe, and Artillary, foz the ſendyng of the Duke John of Albanye into Scotland, which Duke of a great pzeſumption pzomiſed to the French king to dziue the king of England out of his realme, as befoze ye haue heard, which pzomiſe was not kept.

The king of England, heeryng that the Duke of Albany, ſhould paſſe into England, to make warre on his realme, thought to haue him met on the ſeas, and therefoze he pzepared a fleete of tall and ſtrong ſhippes mete to encounter with the ſayd Duke and his power, and made Admirall of that iourney, ſir William Fitzwilliam, and with him ſir Fraunces Bzian, ſir Anthony Poynez, Seriant Rot, John Hopton, William Gunſtone, Anthony Knuet, Thomas Weſt, and other, which with great diligence laye in wayte to meete with the ſayd Duke of Albany, and as they ſayled on the French coaſt, they determidetermined to lande, to do some harme to Tray porte, and as they houered there, they were espyed: then the Capitaine of the towne fired the Beakens, sent for ayd of all the fortresses about, and strengthed and manned the towne very warlyke. This notwithstandyng, sir William Fitzwilliam and other Capitaynes, left not their enterprice, and so the. xxiij. day of August beyng Sunday, at seuen of the clocke in the mornyng, they tooke lande in the Hauen of Trappoyt, at whome the Frenchmen shot out ordinaunce, quarelles, and stones, the Englishmen in the Boates shot likewise, and encouraged by their Capitaines, assaulted the Frenchmen in their Bulwarkes, the French men them valiauntly defended, and the Englishe Capitaynes as men wythout feare, them assayled, and yet the number was nothing egall, for the English men were but seuen hundred men, and the French men fyre thousand. For the well fighting of the Frenchmen, their Bulwarkes were taken, and theyr ordinaunce sealed, and all that were about, fled to the towne of Trappoyt, and euer the Englishemen folowed shotyng arrowes at them, and sleayng them, in which skirmishe Seriant Rot had his Bowe in his hande striken with a Gonne. Then the Capitaynes cryed Saint George, to the Gates of Trappoyt, then euery man aduaunced forwarde, and as they were goyng, Christopher Morres mayster Gonner, espyed a piece of a Maste, which he caused to be taken vp, and then Anthony Kneuet, and Fraunces Neudigate, with their men, ranne with the sayde Maste to the Gate, but the Gate was so strong, that it could not be broken: and also at euery loupe lay a piece of ordinaunce, which continually shot at the Englishemen, which caused them to leaue the gate, and they they set fyre in the suburbes, which was a fayre strete and all was brent, and while the Suburbes brent, the Englishemen went to the hauen, and would haue had out the shippes, but water lacked, wherefore they set fire on them, & brent there. viij. faire ships, beside other. All this while was there skirmishyng at the Gates, and much murder on both sydes, for the Frenchmen in flyng from their Bulwarkes to the towne, lost. lxxx. persons, and many were hurt with arrowes. The men of the Countrie came thether still, insomuch as the number became very great, which sir William Fitzwilliam perceiuyng, caused his trumpet to blowe a retreat, and with suche prisoners, pillage, and ordinaunce as they had gotten, they returned to theyr Boates, and the Capitaynes sent their Souldiours before, the Frenchmen perceiuyng the Englishmen returned, issued out and found on land, Fraunces Neudigate, Thomas Vagham, Seriant Rotte, and other Capitaynes to the number of. xij. and ranne hastily toward them in great number, which perceiuyng that, bended themselues to sell their lyues dere. Sir William Fitzwilliam perceiuyng the great ieopardie that they were in, turned hys boate toward the lande, and discharged his ordinaunce, and with much paine saued these gentlemen, and them toke into Boates, notwithstandyng a great number of Frenche men, which were in the water to let him: and thus the whole army returned to their shippes, after they had bene fiue houres on lande, and brought with them. xxvij. pieces of fayre ordinaunce, which were in the Bulwarkes, and lost of theyr men not fully .xx. persons, and then euery Capitaine tooke his awne ship, and coasted the seas, euer lookyng for the Duke of Albany, but they heard no tidynges of him.

In the Parliament (as you haue heard) it was concluded, that the king of

of necessitie, must nedes make strong warre on the realme of Fraūce, wherfore the noble Charles Duke of Suffolke, was appointed as Capitaine generall, to passe with an army royal into Fraunce, in the ende of August, which with all diligence, prepared all thinges necessary for such a royall enterprise: and for the furniture of this armie, there were appointed to geue their attendaunce on him, the Lorde Mountacute, and sir Arthur Pole his brother, the Lorde Harbert sonne to the Erle of Worcester, the Lorde Ferrers, the Lord Darnay, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkeley, the Lord Powes, and Baron Curson, and of knightes, Sir Richard Wingfield, Chauncelor of the Duchy of Lancaster, sir John Veere, sir Edward Neuel, sir William Kingston, sir Richard Weston, sir Andrew Winsore, sir Anthony Wingfielde, sir Edward Guldford, sir Edward Griuel, sir Edward Chamberleyn, sir Thomas Lucy, sir Euerard Digbby, sir Adrian Foscew, sir William Skeuington Maister of the ordinaunce, sir Thomas Cheyney, sir Richard Cornwal, sir William Courtney, sir William Sidney, sir Henry Owen, all these lords and knightes, with many other knightes and couragious Esquiers, and actiue Gentlemen, came accordyng to the kings commaundement at last, with all their people and retinue to Douer, where they mustered at seuerall tymes, as they passed to the sea, and so the number taken, that is to say of Demilaunces, fyue hundred, of Archers on horsebacke, two hundred, of Archers on foote three thousand, of Billmen fiue thousand, of Pioners and labourers two thousand fyue hundred: and when the view was taken on the other side of the sea, there were adioyned to this number. xvij. hundred, which might be spared out of the Fortresses, and crewes of Hams, Guysnes, and Calice, so that all the army were. xiij. thousand, and an hundreth well harnessed, and apparayled for the warre, the Pioners onely except: But the Duke himselfe arriued at Calice, the. xviij. day of August, with his retinue and Counsaile abidyng the armye, and caused all thinges, as victaile and other, to be prepared for the same.

Much commonyng was in England, whether this army should go, because that no man except a fewe, knewe the secretnesse: some sayde to Bulleyn, some to Parys, and so euery man iudged accordyng to his owne opinion, as the common vse is.

In this season, because the mortalitie was great in Calice, the Duke of Suffolk caused his army to be lodged in Tentes and Pauilions, vpon the faire grene beside Saint Peters Church for their more helth, and he accompanyed with diuers noble men, the. viij. day of September roade to Grauelyng, and thether came to him Christierne king of Denmarke, and the Lorde Isilsten, Capitaine generall of Flaunders, which amiably enterteyned the sayd Duke, and after they had secretly commoned of diuers matters, concernyng diuers armyes to inuade Fraunce, in sundrie places, the Duke tooke leaue of the king and other, and came to Calice.

While the armie laye without Calice, they daply came into the towne, and so it happened that a simple felow cut a purse, as he made to buy apples, which incontinent was taken, and brought to the Maiors house to warde, which thing diuers Welshmen perceiuyng, and not knowyng what appertayned to iustice, ranne in great companies to the Maiors house, & would haue broken the house, the Officers of the towne entreated, and the Welshmen men moze and moze appzoched, the number of the Welſhmen were ſo great, that the watche of Calice ſtrake alarme. Then the Lozde Deputie and the Lozd Sandes, did all that in them lay, to bzing them to conformitie, but they were ſo rude that they nothing them regarded, the prieſtes bzought fozth the Sacrament, which alſo was not regarded. Wherefoze the Lozd Ferrers was ſtaightly commaunded to appeaſe their rage, foz with him they came thether, which with great paine and entreatie them appeaſed: and then all the Welſhemen were commaunded to the field, and to depart the towne and ſo were all other Capitaines, and afterward diuers of the hed rioters were appzehended and ſoze puniſhed foz example. And when all thinges neceſſary were pzepared, the Duke iſſued out of Calice and toke the field, & ozdeyned his marſhall, and Capitaine of the bauntgard, the Lozd Sandes, Capitaine of his right wing ſir William Kingſton, and Capitaine of his left wing, ſyz Euerard Dighby, ſir Edward Guyldfozd Marſhall of Calice, was Cappitaine of all the hozſemen, ſir Richard Wingfielde Capitaine of the rereward: then the Duke with all his armye, as Capitaine of the middle warde, wyth Standardes, Banners, and Penons diſplayed, marched fozward in good ozder of battaile, and came to a place called Kalkewell, and there lodged the xix. day of September. In which place diuers Souldiozs, as Cariers, and vp land men, which were vnmeete foz the war, (foz euery thing to them was paine) fell ſicke and diſeaſed, wherefoze the Duke gaue them leaue by paſſpozt to returne.

The Sacraments.

And on the. xxij. day of September, he tooke vp his campe and came to Hamſwell, and their pitched his field, he thus lying in abode foz the army of Flaunders, which pzomiſed to ioyne with him, which as then were not come to Saint Omers. He entendyng not to lye ſtill ydle ly, ſent Clarenſeaux king at Armes, to ſommon the Caſtell called Bell Caſtell, to yelde to him, oz elſe he would deſtroy it with fyze and ſwozde, the officer of Armes did his meſſage accozdyngly, to whome the Capitain aunſwered, that he would deliuer no Caſtell to the Duke, and if the Duke came thether, he ſhould nothing get, foz he ſayd he was ſure of ſuch reſcues, that ſhould not be to the Dukes aduauntage: which with this aunſwere returned toward the Duke, and in the way he met the Lozde Sandes, and the Lozd Ferrers, in array of battaile, with fiue hundzed hozſemen, and a thouſand footemen, to whome he reherſed the aunſwere, then ſayde the Lozdes, we muſt compell him, if otherwiſe he will not. Then the Maiſter of the ozdinaunce was commaunded to pzepare foz a battery, which was done, and thether came fiue hundzed hozſemen of Burgonions, and fiue hundzed footemen, then the ozdinaunce with great difficultie was bzought nere the Caſtell, and although it were night, the Gunnes ſeaſed not, and bet the place ſoze, they within defended the beſt that they might, and when the day began to ſpzing, the Lozdes cauſed to blowe to the aſſault, which heeryng, the Capitaine of the Caſtell ſayd to his Companions, that they were not able to abyde the aſſault, and that their ſuccozs fayled them, wherefoze of neceſſitie they muſt deliuer the Caſtell, wherto they agreed, and ſo he yelded the Caſtell, his life onely ſaued, and all other at the mercy of the Duke, which pardoned them, and toke them as pziſoners and deliuered the Caſtell to ſir William Skeuington, which was ſhozтly raſed downe to the ground, the. xxbij. day of September.

Monday

Monday beyng the.xxbiij. day of September there was a proclamation made in the armie, how that Fraunces Duke of Burbon, and Constable of Fraunce, was become friend to the king of Englande, and enemie to the French king, and was swoorne to the king of Englande, and had in hys wages for the king of England ten thousand Almaynes to inuade Fraunce, or to let the French kings purposes, and for this intent to him was sent money in no little somme, but the common people sayde, that neuer was French man true to England, howbeit he was true as long as he liued.

Fraunces Duke of Burbon did sodainely become English against the French king.

To make thys proclamation more apparaunt, you must vnderstande that in thys season the French king was ruled by his mother the Countesse of Angulesme, and the Admyrall of Fraunce called Lorde Bonyuet, which as was reported and sayde, loued the sayde Lady as his Paramour, of which all the Court of Fraunce spake much. These two persons so ruled the king, that what they sayde was done, and no iudgement nor sentence passed in the Parliament at Parys without their assent, so that nothing was done without them, at which thing the nobles of Fraunce sore disdayned, and especially the Lorde Fraunces Duke of Burbon and Constable of Fraunce, which hauing a sute for the Erledome of Montpelyer, could not be heard speake nor hys counsayle neyther. At the last he beyng sore displeased with this vnkinde and vniust handlyng, came to the French king beseechyng him of iustice and fauor, which flattering him sayde, that all that was in hys power to doe he would gladly accomplishe, and other aunswere had he none, and to encrease hys grudge the more, the French kings mother made a tytle to the whole Duchy of Burbon and Auerne, and the Admyrall and shee so entised the king, that he sayde openly that the Duke of Burbon shortly should be as pore as the meanest gentleman in Fraunce, which wordes reported to hym, caused him to hate mortally the French king and hys mother, and so in displeasure departed into hys owne Countrie. The king of England beyng hereof aduertised, sent to the Duke of Burbon a knight of hys chamber called sir John Russell, a man well languaged, which wisely and couertly so behaued himselfe, that he came to the Duke to Molyns, and knewe all his intent how he would forsake his king, and serue the king of England and the Emperour agaynst the French king, and therepon toke his othe. The French king not mistrusting the allegeaunce of the Duke of Burbon, sent to the Duke to prepare him to go into Italy, for he had prepared a great army to passe the Mountaynes agaynst the Duke of Myllaine, in which armie he had sixe thousande men of armes, and.xxb. thousand footemen. The Duke hearing hereof fayned himselfe sick, and the French king passyng by Molyns, visited and comforted him: to whome the Duke promised to come shortly after to Lyons with all his power, and caused an horselitter to be caried emptie three dayes amongst a certaine of his Souldiours, as though he were there, but he himselfe fled secretly into the Countie of Burgoyne pertayning to the Emperour, where he retayned ten thousand Almaynes to inuade Fraunce, assone as the frenche king was passed the Mountaynes.

This Sir John Russell was after Lorde priue seale, and after Erle of Bedford.

When the French king heard of thys, he sent the Admyrall into Italy with his armie, and sent his great mayster to seaze all the Dukes landes. Of all these doyngs Sir John Russell brought true worde, for he was present with the Duke, and also sawe the frenche armie, and returned vnespyed, wherefore wherefore he deserued and had of the king and his counsayle great thankes. Whereupon the king caused the proclamation to be made in the armie, that they might knowe that all the power of Fraunce should not trouble them. For what with the warres of Italy and for the Duke of Burbons power they might doe what they lust, and be vnfought withall, which so proued after. Which tydings much encouraged the Englishe Souldyours.

After this proclamation, there were tydinges brought to the armie for a truth, that one Jherom Vicount, a great familier friend with the Duke of Myllayne entised by the French king, had almost slayne Fraunces Duke of Millayne with a dagger behinde at hys backe, with the which doyng the frenche king aboue all persons fayned himselfe to be most displeased. The morowe beyng the. xxix. day of September the Duke with his whole army remoued to Arde and there lodged, and the last day of September he remoued to a Village called Arlke, and from thence the first day of October he came to a village betwene Tyrwyn and saint Omers, called Esqwerdes or Cordes, where the Duke lay and encamped himselfe abyding his enemies.

Now must I returne to tell you what was done betweene Englande and Scotland this same season. Whyle the Duke of Suffolke was thus inuading the realme of Fraunce. The Scottes thinking the warre turned into Fraunce, and that nothyng should be attempted agaynst them, began to robbe and spoyle on the Marches of Englande, whereof the king heeryng sent agayne thether the valyaunt Erle of Surrey, Treasorer and Admyrall of Englande, which in all hast sped him to the West Marches, and sent for an armie of fyre thousand men, and with banner displayed entered by the drie Marches, beating downe Castels and fortresses on euery side. And although the Scots be men of high courage, yet they seyng the wise conduite of the Noble Erle of Surray and his chosen companye, durst not once encounter with him, and so he passed quietly through the dales, till he came to the strong towne of Jedworth, in which lay a great garrison of Scottishe men, which did all the hurt they could to the Englishemen, and hardely in great number skirmished with the Englishe men, so that on both parties dyuers were slain, but in the ende the Abbay, Castell, and towne of Jedworth were brent, and all rased a sunder in the open sight of the Scottes. And after this he would not returne but encamped himselfe in the Scottish ground abidyng battayle, and lay there from the. xxij. day of September, to the. xxv. day. Duryng which time he sent the Lord Daker of Gylderland to a strong holde of Doncar called Fernhurst, the which Castell stood very euill to come to, for the wayes were hylly, stony, and full of Marishes, and the Scottes had bent their ordinaunce that way: yet for all that the English men so fiercely set on that they gat the Castell, notwithstanding that the Scottes fought valyauntly, and many of them were taken, as Dan Car the Lord, the Lord of Gradon and dyuers other which was there taken, and so the Lorde Daker returned with his prisoners, and then he was ordayned to keepe the watch that night, which set his watches and hys wardes surely. In the night sodaynely three hundred good Geldyngs brake out of a pasture, which were in custodie of the sayde Lorde Dacres campe, and as beastes wood and sauage ranne enraged, and notwithstanding that men did as muche as they might to stop them, yet they ranne as though they were in array of bat-tayle, whereof the noyse in the night was so great, that the armie sounned alarme, the horse still in array ranne to the campe where the Erle laye, and bare downe many persons in their way, and so sodainly ranne away, whether it was vnknowne: the Lorde Dacres men sayde that the Deuill was sene amongst them: and after the third day the Erle returned into England.

When the Erle of Surrey departed from the borders in August as you haue heard heretofore: The Scottes wrote to the Duke of Albany of all their affaires, which was comming into Scotland. But when he heard that the Navie of England laye in a wayte to fight with him, he durst not auenture, but sate still: And when he heard there was no Capitaynes of name on the borders of England toward Scotlande, he deuised by pollicie that all his ships should be remoued to the hauen of Brest, and sayde himselfe and caused it to be noysed that he would not sayle into Scotlande that yere. So ranne the voyce all the coastes of Normandie and Britayne, and so passed till the ende of September.

The craftie pollecie of the Duke of Albany.

The king of England was informed by such as knew none other, that the Duke of Albany had broken his iorney, and would not passe that yere into Scotland. Wherefore the king of England in the middest of September caused his ships to be layd vp in Hauens till the next spring: The Duke of Albany beyng thereof aduertised, boldly then tooke his shippes and shipped his people, and with. lxxij. sayle in sight passed by the West partes of England, and coasted Wales, and with great labor landed at Kircowbre in the West part of Scotland with all hys people, the. xxj. day of September, which were in number three thousand or there about, and with him was the Traytor Richard de la pole.

When it was knowne in Scotlande that the Lorde Gouernour was landed, muche gladnesse there was amongst the people. Then the Duke was highly receyued and his people well cherished, and then began a parlyament. The king of England hearing that the Duke of Albany was landed in Scotland and was vnfought withall, was not a little displeased, and suspected that suche as enformed him that the Duke would not passe that yere, had deceyued him, but there was no remedie: Wherfore he made prouisions and put all things in a readynesse, if he would attempt any thing agaynst him and his realme.

The Duke of Albany landeth in Scotland.

The Duke of Albany gouernor of Scotland being in the parliament of the realme with great eloquence declared to them the loue and favor that Fraunces the French king bare to the realme of Scotlande, in somuch that he being aduertised of the great murders, slaughters, and burninges done by the Englishmen, thought that he suffered no lesse hurt and dammage then they did, accompting himselfe one of their members, and them likewise the members of him and his realme, and for the reuenging of the same, he to be partener as their member, and for the more credite he shewed the French kinges letter, affirming his declaration. When the letters were red, there start vp a Baron of Scotlande called the Lorde Forbos, which sayde: the realme of Scotlande for the loue of Fraunce suffereth great paine as dayly doth appere, for our Nobles be dayly slayne or taken, our Commonaltie murdered, our landes ouerrunne our houses and fortesses brent and rased, the profites of our landes we lese: which mischiefe we nede not to haue had

but for the loue of Fraunce, what helpeth Fraunce? A far friend is not sone fet: A mightie neighbour may be a cruell enemie. I affirme this, if we would kepe amitie with the realme of England we were out of all these daungers. God forbid said the Duke of Albany that Scotland euer should seeke a new friende or profer their amitie, to the destroyers of their countrie and nation, but you my Lords of Scotland ar sufficient of your selues to maintaine your landes, liberty and fredome against your common enemies the Englishmen. And therefore now let vs together reuenge the hurtes done to vs and oure countrye: and I on mine honor shall go with you, and therefore I haue brought with me both treasure, men, and artillery into this realme. I thinke not but we shall so doe that all christendome shall speake of oure noble conquest. To the Dukes request all the court of parliament agreed, and then were commissions sent through Scotlande and cryes made that all men should assemble at Doglas dale with vittayle for. xxviij. dayes. The Scottes in all hast prepared, so that the Lordes were come to the place appointed the xviij. day of October, with vittaile, gunnes, and all other artillery, and so came by easy iourneyes to the riuer of Twede on a grounde beside Hume castell, and from thence came to Cawdestrene and there lodged.

The Duke of Albany raiseth a great power of Scotland against king Henry and the realme of Englande.

All this doing the king of England knewe well, wherefore with all diligence he caused to be assembled the people of the North part beyond Trent whereof there were thre thousand bering coates of armes with their power and strength, which all were commaunded to resort to the Erle of Surrey with spede. The noble Marques Dorset Thomas was appoynted to kepe Barwicke with six thousand men, least the Scottes would therto laye siege.

The Duke of Albany which lay on the frountiers heering of the Erle of Surreyes preparing, sent to him an Herauld promising him of his honour to geue him battaile, and if he tooke him in battaile he would put him to curteous raunsome and his bodye to be safe: To whome the Erle aunswered, that much he thanked the Duke of his offer, and that he would abide battaile, promising him that he would geue him battayle if he durst abyde: and if that the sayd Duke were taken prisoner by him or his men he would strike of his head and send it to the king of England his Maister, and bade that he should trust to none other, at which aunswere the Duke of Albany and the Scots toke great despyte.

A bitter and yet a valiant aunswere made by the Erle of Surrey vnto the Duke of Albany.

The Erle of Surrey being at Alnwike, to him came the Erles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lord Clyfford, the lord Dacres, the lord Lumley, the Lord Ogle, the lord Darcy, and many noble knightes, squiers, and yomen, to the number of. xl. M. And from the kings court was sent to be at the battail sir Nicholas Carew maister of the horse, sir Fraunces Bryan, sir Edward Baynton and diuers other. All this army lay on the borders abiding the Scots comming into England which lay still in Scotland, and did nothing till the last day of October beyng Saterday. The night before the Scottes had sent ouer the water into England three or foure thousand men, to laye siege to a little Castell called the Castell of Warke, which standeth nere the border: the great ordinaunce of Scotlande fore bet the Castell, and Dan Car and the Frenchmen which came out of Fraunce with the Duke of Albany gaue to the Castell a strong assault: within the Castell was sir William Lyle with a hundred persons, but the Scottes were so many in number that they gotte the vttermoſt ward called the Barnkyns where the Beaſtes and barnes were, which ſeyng, the Captaine ſent in all haſte to the Erle of Surrey aduertiſing him of their diſtreſſe, which in all haſt aſſembled his Cappytaines to reſkue the Caſtell, therby hopyng that Duke John of Albany would enter into England. The Frenchmen and Scottes lay ſtill about the Caſtell continually ſhooting ordinaunce, Sonday and Monday the firſt and ſecond day of Nouember, and then the Scots thynking the place aſſaultable, coragiouſly ſet on the Caſtell and by ſtrength entered the ſecond ward. Sir William Lile percepuing that the Scottes had gotten the falſe brayes and that nothing remayned but only the inner ward or Dongeon, ſayde to his company, Sirs for our honor and manhood let vs iſſue and fight with the proude Scots & ſtately frenchmen, for more ſhal our honor be to dye in fight then to be murthered with gunnes, to the which his company that were left agreed: for of his hundred men he had loſt almoſt fortie at the other aſſaults. Then they iſſued out boldely and ſhot coragiouſly as men that ſhot for a vantage, and with ſhooting and fighting they draue their enemies cleane out of the place and ſlew of them, and chiefely of the Frenchmen three hundred which lay there dead in ſight when the Erle came thether, beſide ſuch as died of woundes and were drowned. Then the Scottes remoued their ordinaunce, in great haſt ouer the water, and by that time was the Erle of Surrey come with fiue thouſand men on horſebacke and all his great army followed and was very ſory that his enemies were gone, and much prayſed Sir William Lyle for his valiauntneſſe.

When the Duke of Albany and the Lordes of Scotland knew that the Erle of Surrey approched with his puiſſaunt army, they thought it not conuenient to iooperd all the nobilitie of Scotland in one field, conſidering their chaunce ten yeares before, and therefore they concluded to returne, and ſo on the ſecond day of Nouember in the night the Duke with all his army retreated more for his fiertie then honor.

The Scots retire and ly againe into Scotland.

The horſemen of Scotlande kept the fordes that no man ſhould paſſe to greue the footemen as they returned, and when all the baggages were gone they caſt themſelues in a plumpe and returned.

When the daye appered, then the Engliſhmen might plainlye ſee the Scottes how they fled fiftie mens thickeneſſe, many a luſtie Engliſhman woulde fayne haue folowed them on horſebacke, and ſo woulde the Erle of Surrey with all his hart, but his commiſſion was only to defend the realme and not to inuade Scotlande, which thing him ſore diſpleaſed. Thus brake vp the great army of Scotlande to the great rebuke of the Duke of Albany and the nobles of Scotlande which two yeres together had made bragges and aſſembles and durſt not abyde battaile. The Scottes made much brags that they had beaten downe the walles of Warke Caſtel, but they ſpake nothing of their men that they left there, nor how cowardly they returned and would not abyde. After this returne Queene Margaret of Scotland and mother to the yong king, ſent to her brother the king of England for an abſtinence of warre to be taken betweene the realme of Englande and Scotland, to the entent that ſome way might be taken, that an amytie might be had betweene them: which requeſt was to her graunted, and ſo the great army of Englande was diſſolued & the Erle of Surrey returned to the coaſt.

In

In this season, the Emperor Charles sent to the king of England two Mules trapped in crimosyn Ueluet curiously enbroudered, all the Buckles, stroppes and all such other garnishyngs were siluer and gilt of marueylous comyng worke. He sent also. xj. Genets full goodly to beholde, trapped with russet veluet richely wrought, and toure Speares, and two Jauelynges of straunge timber and worke richly garnished, and fiue brace of Greyhounds: and to the Queene he sent two Mules, with riche trappers & high Chapers after the Spanishe fashion, all these presentes were thankfully receyued both of the king and Queene. A present sent by the Emperor to the king.

Now let vs returne to the Duke of Suffolke which lay at Corbes or Esquerdes the.xx. day of September, and thether came to him the armie of Flaunders, whereof was Capitain the Lord of Isilsteyne, which had with him of Spaniardes, Almaynes, Cleues and other, three thousand footemen, and fiue hundred horsemen well apparayled for the warres in all poyntes.

The Duke of Suffolke beyng thus furnished passed forwarde in wet weather makyng bridges and wayes, euer lookyng for battaile, and on the xvij. day of October he sent the Lorde Sandes Marshall of his armye, and with him three thousand men to a good towne called Amer, which accompanied with diuers knightes and gentlemen in good order of battaile marched toward the towne. The French men perceiuyng the Englishmen comyng toward their towne, fled out as fast as they might, and left the towne desolate: then entered the Englishemen, and had there a great bootie, and tooke the Castell called Bonegard, & therein put a garrison of Englishmen, whereof was Capitaine the Lorde Leonard Gray brother to the Marques Dorset to conduct vittaylers to the armie, which now was farre from any succors of the Englishe part. In this towne was an Abbay of Monkes which receyued humbly the Lordes and Nobles of England, which to them did no hurt nor dammage, and then they returned to the Duke. The towne of Amber taken.

After this, the.xix. day, the Duke with his armye, passed to a village called Qwede: and there after long counsailyng it was determined that the whole armie should passe to a strong towne and well fortifyed called Braye, which towne was well ordinaunced, and had in it .xvj.C. men of warre, the Capitain thereof was called Adrian, and for succors to the towne were come Mounsire Pontdormy, the Uicount Lernerdam, the Uicount Turraine, Mounsire Applyngcort, and Mounsire Dampney, with fiue hundred horsemen, so that in the towne beside the Inhabitauntes were two thousande good men. This towne standeth on the ryuer of Some. xviij. Englishe mile from Arras, and.xiiij. myles aboue Amias: This towne was well ditched and strengthned on euery side.

The.xx. day of this moneth, the Duke commaunded all his great ordinaunce to be brought by foure of the clocke in the morynyng before the towne of Bray, they that had the charge thereof so manfully acquited them, that notwithstandyng all the dammage that their enemyes could do, brought the ordinaunce before the towne at the houre appointed. Then eche part shot dreadfully at other, but the Englishe Gunners shot so well, that the walles of the towne were beaten downe and rased with the ordinaunce, insomuche that by. ix. of the clocke the towne was made assaultable. Then the Duke caused to blowe to the assault. Then the Englishemen and Fleminges, and The towne of Bray besieged.

Burgonions lept foorth quickly, and notwithstandyng that the ditches were deepe, yet they so couragiously entered by the good comfort of the Lorde Sandes, and other noble men that they gat the ditches. The Frenchemen perceiuyng that the towne should be gotten, hastily made traynes of Gunpowder from streete to streete, and house to house, saiyng that the Englishemen after their entry into the towne would fall to pillage, and then sodainly sodaine fyre should destroy them. This was the prouision of the Frenchmen: by this tyme the Englishmen were entryng on the walles, and the Frenchmen stoode yet at defence with Pykes, Crosbowes, Handgunnes, and Halberdes, but they were to weake, for on all parties entered the Englishmen, and sodainely the Frenchmen fled, and the Englishemen folowed and killed and slue in euery part.

The towne of Bray taken by the Duke of Suffolke and destroyed

Nowe you must vnderstand that this towne of Bray standeth on the riuer of Some which is there deuided in diuers braunches, and betweene euery braunch is a marishe ground, where on the farside of the towne was fortifyed a Bulwarke full of ordinaunce to kepe the passage ouer the water, and the Frenchmen had losed the plankes of the bridge nere a myle aboue Bray, and the horsemen of Fraūce passed by a mille which was to the French fotemen a great ayde, for they stood and kept the passage till the footemen were come ouer the bridge, and then they plucked away the plankes of the bridge, so that no man shoulde folowe, but euer the Englishe men folowed, and cast plankes on the bridge, and passed ouer the bridge, in which passyng diuers were drowned, but with great trauaile all men passed, horsemen and footemen, and fiercely assaulted the Bulwarke, and tooke it with al the ordinance, and in it was taken, Capitaine Idrian, and Capitaine Ulterlew. The Englishe horsemen folowed the Frenchmen, and diuers of them were slaine and taken, sir Robert Jernyngham brake a speare of the Lorde Pountdormy. The Lord Leonard Gray did valiauntly that day. You must remember that when the Frenchmen issued out of the towne, they forgat not to lay a match to the traine of Gunpowder which they had made, which in short space set the towne all on fyre, so that when the Englishemen returned againe, all was on fyre, so that there they had little profite but Wyne, which to them did great pleasure. Thus was the towne of Bray taken, and destroyed the.xx. day of October.

The Duke considery̆ng that little succors were for him and his Souldiors in the towne of Bray, because the sayd towne was consumed with fire, he therefore commaunded the bridges to be well repayred for to passe ouer the great riuer of Some into the realme of Fraunce: and when the passage was sure, the Lorde Sandes the. xxi. day of October in the morning was prest to passe ouer with the Vawarde. Then some Gentlemen sayde that they would passe no farther forward, and diuers Souldiours were of the same opinion. It was asked why they should feare, and they answered that if they were past ouer the riuer, they were past all succours and vittaile, none coulde be brought to them. By reason of this noyse, the Souldiours stayed, which the Lorde Sandes perceiuyng, saide to the Welchemen which were euill willyng to passe the riuer: Sirs sayde he, beholde what I do, and with that he tooke a Banner of Saint George, and sayde, as many as loue the king of England, and be true to him and to the Crowne, folow me, & then he

he and ſir William Kingſton ſet forwarde and paſſed the water, which there runneth in three ſtreames, then al other perſons couragiouſly folowed, with the ordinaunce and vittayles.

After the forward folowed the Duke and all his battaile: At this time the armie was ſore minished by reaſon many were diſeaſed, and from the hoſt departed, ſo the hoſt was not of that ſtrength that it was at the ſettyng out of Calice. When the Engliſhmen were paſſed, then folowed the Burgonions in good order, and ſo that night this armie came to a towne called Kappe, and there encamped themſelues, all the Inhabitauntes were fled both out of the towne and Caſtell: there the Engliſhemen found a hundred tonne of Wyne, and other good pillage. The garriſon that lay at Anker, knowyng that the Duke was paſſed the riuer of Some, raſed the towne and Caſtell, and came and ioyned with the Dukes armie at Kappe.

There the Duke cauſed Proclamations to be made in the armye that all the people of Fraunce that would vittaile the armie of England ſhould be well entreated, and haue their vittayles well payed for, and ſafe goyng and commyng, by the which Proclamation the hoſt was well vittayled, for the people of the country reſorted with all thinges neceſſary.

The Duke thus lyng at Kappe ſent to the towne of Roy to yeeld them to the king of England. The towne perceiuyng that their power was not able to withſtand the great armye of the Duke, aſſented to deliuer the towne to the Duke. This was a ſtrong towne well walled, ditched and ordinaunced, but not manned: the Duke ſent thether ſir Richard Cornwall, and other with foure hundred men to receyue the towne, which went thether in good array, and had the towne to them deliuered, and then they ſet the Banner of Saint George in the higheſt part of the towne, and full well this garriſon kept the towne of Roy till the Duke came thether with his whole armie.

The towne of Roy yelded to the Duke.

The Duke and his army the .xvb. day of the ſayde moneth remoued to a billage called Lyhome, & had there great pillage: for this towne was much haunted of Marchantes, & there kept great markets. The next day he remoued to Dauenker, and the .xvbij. day he remoued and came before the ſtrong towne of Mountdedier, where for defence of warre lacked neyther ditches, walles, nor bulwarkes: The horſemen of the Engliſh army roade about the towne to view it, at whome the Capitaynes cauſed diuers peeces to be loſed, which ſhewed well their ſtrength. The Duke ſent an officer of armes to ſommon the Capitaine to deliuer the towne: the officer departed, and wyth him a trumpet which blewe before the Gate, but no perſon would aunſwere, becauſe they would haue no ſummons made to them: the officer of Armes returned and made report. Then the Dukes ſkyrrers made proffer afore the towne, out of the which iſſued a great company of horſemen and ſkirmyſhed with the Dukes horſemen, and fought valiantly, but at the laſt .xl. of the horſemen were taken, with which the Lorde Roche Baron Capitaine of the towne was ſore diſpleaſed, yet he thought him able to maintain the towne agaynſt the whole army. Then the Duke of Suffolke pitched his field and layd his ſiege round about the towne of Mountdedier, and kept good watch and warde on euery ſyde: which thing the Lorde Roche Baron perceiuyng, comforted his men of warre, and bad them not be afrayed, but to be of good courage, and ſayd that the Duke there ſhould get nothing. When the Duke had had thus planted his siege, he considered that he was farre from rescue and that lying still and nothing doyng was not profitable, he knewe also by report of the prisoners that in the towne of Mountdedier were two thousand footemen, and one thousand horsemen: wherefore he sent for all the Lordes and Capitaines of his army, and much praysed their hardinesse, and sayd that the noble courage that he sawe in them did much auaunce him to set forward in all things, the prayse where of should be to them, and not to him, and therfore nowe he encouraged them againe to continue still in their valiaunt doyng, for with Gods grace he entended to bend his ordinaunce the next morning before the towne, to the which all the Lordes agreed, and praysed much the Dukes courage and forwardnesse.

Sir wylliam Skeuington

Aduēturers.

Krechers.

Then was sir William Skeuyngton knight, Maister of the ordinance, commaunded to prepare for the battery, which with all diligence made trenches, and prepared all things meete for the purpose. In this season sir John Walop knight, had with him almost a thousande proper men and hardy, hauyng little wages or none which liued alonely on their auenture, wherefore of some they were called aduenturers, of some they were called Krechers. These men were light, hardie, and pollitike, and by their manhood and hardinesse had robbed many townes, taken many prisoners, with great booties, and dayly brought to the army horses, mares, vitaile, cloth, corne, and other necessaryes which might not be missed. Of this company the Frenchmen, and especially they of villages, and passengers were sore afrayed, for they were neuer vble, but doyng somthing in one part or other. The Lord Pountdormy, or Pountremy, heering Mountdedier was besieged, called to him diuers great Lordes and Capitaynes to the number of fiue hundred men of Armes and diuy Launces, and a great number of footemen, entendyng to bring Gunpowder and other necessaryes to the towne of Mountdedier: and as they were thether comming by night, Thomas Palmer, Capitaine of the skout watch of the Englishe army them alayed and skirmished with them although they were more in number: manfully fought the French men, but for all that, they were compelled to flie backe, and then the Englishmen them followed, and slue diuers, and two Speares were broken on the brother of the Lorde Pountdormy, but by the swiftnesse of his horse he saued himselfe, and in this chase were an hundred prisoners taken, which much reioysed the Englishe men.

When the maister of the ordinaunce had all thinges readie, at the houre of foure of the clocke in the morning, he discharged the ordinaunce continually in such fashion, that by .viij. of the clocke the .xviij. day of October the walles were made low, and the towne assaultable. All which while, the great ordinaunce shot still out of the towne till the walles and towne were beaten downe. The Capitaine of the towne perceiuyng this, called to him all the Capitaynes, declaryng to them that their towne was in foure houres made assaultable, and that surely the Englishmen would assault the towne which should be to their confusion, wherefore he asked their aduise what was best to be done, all they answered, do as you will: Then he went into a Tower, and caused a Trumpet to blow, and set forth a Banner of truce. Then the Duke commaunded the ordinaunce to cease. Then sir William Skeuyngton came to the walles and demaunded what they would, and the lord Roche

Baron

Baron ſayd, that if it pleaſed the Duke for the loue of the king of England, and his honor, to graunt to him and the other Gentlemen that were there, licence to depart with life, bagge and baggage, they would deliuer the towne of Mountdedier. Then ſir William Skeuington made report to the Duke which thereto conſented, ſaiyng: they be men of warre, their ryches is not great. Then the Lord Sandes and diuers other were appoynted to receyue the towne, and ſo they entered and ſet Standardes on the top of the Gates, and tooke the keyes of all the ſtrong houſes, Towers, and Bulwarkes. The French men were redie to depart with truſſages, and cariages, wyth Croſbowes, Pykes, and Handgunnes, with which doyng the Lord Sands and the Engliſhmen which were within the towne were not content, & ſayd that the Frenchmen ſhould paſſe without weapon: on this poynt was much alteration, and the Frenchmen were ſtayed, but the Lord Roche Baron gaue many fayre wordes, and paſſed forward with a red ſtandard, with a whyte Croſſe before him, that ſeyng ſir Thomas Palmer, ranne to the ſtandarde and plucked it in pieces. Then ſayde the Lord Roche Baron, that it was vngently done: to whome he anſwered that he ſhould beare no ſtandard there lyke a conquerour. Then after long diſputation, the Frenchmen ſayd, that it was promiſed them that they ſhould haue their weapons and baggage, and ſo vpon that they were ſuffered to depart. The footemen likewiſe had a ſtandard before them, which was rent by ſir Robert Iernyngham. The number which departed truely accompted, were two thouſand footemen, fiue hundred horſemen and odde, well and warlyke appoynted, and they left muche baggage behinde them, becauſe they ſawe the Engliſhmen ſo faſt come into the towne, they were in feare of loſſe of all.

The towne of Mountdedier yelded and taken.

When the Frenchmen were departed, the Duke with his whole army entered the towne and there the Engliſhe men founde fine Fetherbeds, napery, couerings, and much houſholde ſtuffe, and eſpecially of wyne great plentie, and there the armie reſted till the laſt day of October, and then were all the gates of the towne raſed and thy towne downe, and all the Bulwarkes lykewiſe, then the Duke cauſed all the ordinaunce to be taken, and ſo remoued to the towne of Roye, where he and all his armie reſted for a whyle: whereof they were glad, for they had trauayled ſore, and the weather was wet and colde. On the feaſt of all ſaints called Whalon day, the Duke in the chiefe Church of Roye made knightes, the Lorde Harbert, the Lorde Powes, Olyuer Manners, Arthur Pole, Richard Sandes, Robert Iernyngham, Robert Saliſbury, Edmond Benyngfield, Richard Cozbet, Thomas Wentworthe, Wylliam Stozton, Water Mantell, George Warran, Edward Seymour after Erle of Hartford, and Duke of Sommerſet, and moſt worthy gouernour of the kinges maieſties perſon, and Protector of all hys realmes, dominions and ſubiects.

The morrow after, the armie remoued to a place called Neele, there the Burgonions began to ware wearie, and ſo did the Engliſhmen, for euery day was foule weather, and raine both day and night. Wherefore dyuers companies fell to grudging ſaiyng, now you may ſee that by our remouing we ſhall be led from place to place all this Wynter, which is to the vtter loſſe of our lyues: for daylie we ſee that of our companye dyeth no ſmall number (and truth it was that ſome dyed but not many) they ſayde farther, the Burgomons gonions haue the great gaine, and doe least for it, for they haue Wagons and carie their booties to their Countrie, which is nere hande, and we go before and fight, and we haue no meanes to conuey anye thing into our Countrie for lack of cariage, and so we beate the bushe and they take the byrdes. This grudge was sealled by gentle wordes for a time.

In these iorneys was commonly spoken that the Duke of Burbon with his ten thousand Almaynes would haue inuaded Fraunce and so ioyned with this armie, but the truth was contrarie, for he turned his host another way and went into prouince and layde siege to Marcelles, whereof the Duke beyng aduertised, not a little mused, and also seyng his men daylie fall sick, was sorie, and yet he so comforted them that euery man was glad to folow his will and entent.

On the fire day of Nouember the Lorde Sandes beyng Capitayne of the foreward, and the Duke of the middle warde, and syr Richarde Wyngfield Capitaine of the rereward came in order of battayle prest to fight, to a village called Ueane, and there rested for that night, and the morrow after the whole armie returned agayne ouer the water of Some, and came to a place called Beaufford: At thys passage the Duke made knightes, John Dudley, and Robert Utreyght Esquires.

This John Dudley was after made Erle of Warwick and Duke of Northumberland.

The eyght day the Duke remoued to a place called Mount saint Martyne, a very meete place for an armie, and then was the Dukes instructions looked vpon by the Capytaynes, and they perceyuing that they hard nothing of the Duke of Burbons comming, ayde nor counsayle, all they thought and determined to send the Lorde Sandes in post to the king, to declare all the case as it stoode and their necessitie, according as he himselfe knewe and sawe in all poyntes: which Lorde Sandes tooke great paine, and made good diligence toward the king, and while he was ridyng, the Duke remoued his armie to a place called Vermount and there lodged for a time to rest, and the armie was well vytayled, but euer the Welshemen muttered and grudged more and more.

A great frost

After the great rayne and windes that had fallen, came a feruent frost, so sore that many a soldiour dyed for colde, some lost fyngers and some toes, but many lost their nayles of their hands, which was to them a great griefe. The Duke all thys notwithstanding remembryng that he came not thether to lye still, the. xiij. daye remooued to a place two Myle from the Castell of Bowhen and still it friesed, in so much that the Maister of the Ordinaunce was compelled of necessitie to set the wheeles of his ordinaunce on Hardels for sinking. In the morning the Welshemen set out a shout and cryed home, home, the Krekers hering that, cryed hang hang. For which matter deuision was like to haue fallen, but by pollicy it was ceased. Sir Edward Eldford Capitaine of the horsemen bewed the Castell of Bowhen or Boghan, which euer was thought to be impregnable, but he iudged it might be wonne, for the Castell was enuironned with marises, so that to no mans iudgement it was possible to winne it: But nowe he perceyued that the Frost was so great and strong that it might be besieged, and al that night it friesed againe: wherefore he desired the Duke to geue him leaue to assault it, which thereto agreed. Then he caused the ordinaunce to be set foorth ouer the marrishe. When they within the Castell perceyued that the marrishe fayled them, they were ſore diſmayed. Then ſyr Edward Guildford ſhot three great pieces at the Caſtell, and the Caſtilian ſhot three pieces agayne. Then as the Engliſhe Gonners were preparing to the batterie, the Capitayne ſeyng hys Caſtell could not hold by reaſon that the mariſhe fayled, and that he coulde defende none aſſault, delyuered the Caſtell to him to the behoofe of the Emperor, and the king of Englande, and after a ſmall communication had betwene the ſayde ſyr Edward Guildforde and the Capitayne, the Capitayne with all his retinue departed, leauing behinde the ordinaunce of Bombards, Curtawes, and demy Curtaux, Slinges, Canons, Volgers, and other ordynaunce, there were .lxxvj. pieces, plentie of pellettes and powder. The Duke of Suffolke perceyuing that this Caſtell ſtood on the border of Henaude: Wherefore the more to pleaſe the Henawders he made Capitain of the ſame Caſtell of Boghan the Seneſchal of Henaude, to the behoofe of the Emperour and the king of Englande. In thys place the armie was euill vitayled, becauſe the Frenchmen had ſtopped the water of Some, that no vitayle ſhould paſſe ouer the ryuer: wherefore the Duke ſent to them of Henaude, and eſpecially to them of Valencien to haue ayde of vitayle, which of their little ſent to the armie a little, but yet it did them ſome ſeruice, and all thys whyle the feruent froſt with bitter windes contynued, which cauſed many people to die: yet ſtill lay the armie abidyng the anſwere of the Lord Sandes, which as you haue heard road in poſte, and ſo much trauayled that he came to the king of Englande to his Caſtell of Wyndſore, and there declared to the king his meſſage, which was that his people which were in the frenche ground abode much miſerie, for the weather was wet, the wayes deepe, long nightes and ſhort dayes, great iorneys and little vytaile, which cauſed the ſouldiours daylie to die. Alſo they truſted when they paſſed the ſeas according to their inſtructions to haue ayde of the Duke of Burbon (of whome ſithe their departing they neuer heard worde) wherefore the Duke of Suffolke and other nobles of your armye hath ſent me to your highneſſe to declare their ſtate and condition, their good will to tarie, and the euill chaunces which daylie happeneth to them by God and not by their enimies. Well ſayde the king, all thys we knewe before your comming: wherfore we haue appointed the Lorde Mountioy with fiue thouſande men, to paſſe the ſeas for the reliefe of our armie, which Lorde Mountioy is almoſt in a readyneſſe: For we will in no wiſe that the armie ſhall breake.

The Caſtell of Bowhe or Boghan is yelded to the king and the Emperor.

Then the king came to Weſtminſter to the Cardinals place, and there receyued letters from the Duke of Suffolke by ſyr Robert Jernyngham, of the getting of the Caſtell of Boghan or Bowen: wherefore incontinent it was by the king and his counſayle determined that the Lorde Mountioy ſhould make ſpeede, which did ſuche diligence that manye of hys Souldiours were come to London well harneſſed and weaponed readie to paſſe the ſeas. Wherefore the king ſent in all haſte ſyr Robert Jernyngham agayne to declare to the Duke the kings pleaſure and what ayde was comming towarde him. But or ſyr Robert Jernyngham could come to the Duke, the armie was remooued from Bohan and brent the towne, and ſo came to the Citie of Valencine in Henaude, and there layde vp their ordinaunce, and from thence came to the Citie of Tournay (which then was vnder the Emperour and out of the French kings hands) and ſo tooke their iorney homewarde warde thorow Flaunders and the armie there broken and dispatched. But when the Duke met with syr Robert Jernyngham at Bridges in Flaunders and knewe the kinges minde and entent, he did what he might to retreate the souldiours, which could not be, for many Englishe men shipped at Andwarpe, and many at Sclues, and at Newport and other Hauens, and they that were at Calice were stayed for a time, but when the Duke sawe that he could not bring al his armie together scarcely the fourth part, he then licensed the remnaunt to depart. Of thys breaking vp of the armie were letters sent to the king, which incontinent stopped the Lorde Mountioy and sent his men into the Countrey agayne. The Duke and other Capitaynes hearing of the kings displeasure, were sore abashed, and did write to their frendes that they had perfite knowledge that the Duke of Burbon had broken vp his campe for the extremity of the Winter, and also shewed that their souldyours dyed, and vitayle fayled, which caused them to breake the army, for of truth the souldiours would not abide: with which reasons the king was somewhat appeased, and so on good hope the Duke came to Calice the twelfe day of December, and there abode long, till their friends had sued to the king for their returne. And when it was graunted, and that they were returned, the Duke and the Capitaines came not to the kings presence in a long season, to their great heauinesse and displeasure: But at the last all things were taken in good part, and they well receyued, and in great loue, fauour, and familiaritie with the king.

While the Duke of Suffolk was in Fraunce and the Erle of Surrey on the Marches of Scotland, the Cardinall sent out commissions in the moneth of October throughout the realme, that euery man that was worth. xl. pound should pay the whole subsidy before graunted out of hande, and before the dayes of payment. This payment was called an Anticipation, which is to say, a thing taken, or a thing comming before his time or season: This terme was new to ỹ Comunaltie, but they payd well for their learning, for their money was payed out of hand without delay.

An anticipation.

The king this yeare kept his Christmas solempnely at his Castell of Wyndsore and thether came to him the thyrde daye of Januarye the Erle Bountiuer of the royall bloud of Brytayne and pretending to be Duke of the same, which was nere Cosin to the Duke of Burbon and banyshed Fraunce. Thys Erle came hastily from the Duke of Burbon and was well entertayned and feasted of the king, and after aunswere made to him by the king, he went to the Cardinal to Hampton court, and so with great spede returned to the sayd Duke into the countrie of Prouince.

In the same season was brought to the court a Gentleman of Scotland called Andrew Steward taken on the sea with diuers letters by one Water Jago a yoman of the kinges, with diuers letters from the Duke of Albany to the French king, by reason whereof the king knew much of their counsayle, This Gentleman payed raunsome and was very soone redeemed.

The. xix. day of January six sayle shippes of Fraunce well appoynted met with a ship of the kinges of England called the Caterine Galley a shyp of forty tonne, the Capitayne whereof was one John Mariner, with a small company, for many of his company were a lande: But he so encoraged his men that all feare was set aside, and euer as the Frenchmen approched, they bette bette them of with arrowes, pikes, and fighting, and still they continued from foure of the clocke in the morning till nine of the clocke, and euer on the coast of England, and the Englishmen dyd the best they could to saue themselues: for by that time shee had spent her powder, arrowes with shooting, and her byls with hewing, and her pikes with keping them of from comming aboord, and al the company almost sore hurt, and the Capitaine wounded to the death so that they had no other remedy but to sayle. This chace was perceyued by one called Cappitayne Markam, Capitayne of the Barke of Sandwyche hauen and with good winde came to rescue the Katerine Galley. The six shippes perceiuing that, left their chace and made with the Barke of Sandwiche. The Capitaine couragiously comforted his men and made the quarters of his shippe defensable. The Frenchmen set on fiersly, and their toppes were higher then the toppe of the English shippe. Out went the ordinaunce, quarels and dartes of the French shippes: the Englishmen shot fiersly again and when the Frenchmen profered to enter, the Englishmen bette them of with byles. The Frenchmen at the last with a great gunne bette downe the toppe of the Barke and slue the men in the same, and lastly they strake downe his Mast. This conflict continued from ten of the clocke tyll two at after noone. Then he could make no shifte, but to sayle: and euer the Englishmen shot arrowes, and while the Englishmen had any arrowes the Frenchmen durst not enter: But when their arrowes were spent, the Frenchmen came aboord all at once and entred the Barke. In this fight were slayne of French men out of hand. xxbij. and. lxxx. sore hurt, and of the Englishmen were slaine xxiij. What should I saye, the Englishmen fought valiauntly but they were to weake for six talle shippes. Wherefore they were taken and brought to Depe for a price, but the Frenchmen saide they neuer bought price so dere. After this John Marmer Cappitayne of the Katerin Galley dyed and many Frenchemen that were hurt died at Depe, so that neyther part wan greatly.

In the last month called December were taken certaine Traytors in the Citie of Couentrie, one called Fraunces Phillip Scholemaister to the kings Henrmen, and one Christopher Pykering clerke of the Larder, and one Anthony Waynuile Gentleman, which by the perswasion of the sayd Fraunces Phillip, entended to haue taken the kinges treasure of his subsidye as the Collectors of the same came towarde London, and then to haue raysed men and taken the Castell of Kyllingworth, and then to haue made battayle against the king: wherefore the sayd Fraunces, Christopher and Anthonye were hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tyborne the .xj. day of Febuary, the residue that were taken, were sent to the Citie of Couentry and there were executed. One of the kinges Henrmen called Dygby which was one of the conspirators fled the realme, and after had his pardon. In insurrection moued at Couentry.

The .xbij. day of January there was a fayre or marquet at the towne of Marguyson in the French kings dominions beside Calice, and for defence of the people and their marchandise, there were appointed two hundred men in harnesse well weaponed: the Souldiers of Guysnes heering of this, departed in the night and came nere to the towne of Marguyson, and closely kept themselues tyll the Market was faire and at the best, then the Englishmen which were .lxx. Archers and byles, set sodainly on the Market, that seyng the Frenchmen stood manfully at their defence with handgunnes and pykes, but the Englishe men shotte so wholy together that they draue the Frenchmen out of the towne, and would for succors haue taken the churche but the Englishmen were betweene them and the Churche, so that they had none other remedy but to flee and many French men were slayne. Capitaine John de Pounde, and Capitaine John de Babage and diuers other were taken prisoners, and diuers Marchantes that were there to sell their goodes were also taken, and all their goodes brought in Frenchmens wagones to Guysnes and no Englishman slaine but diuers were sore hurt.

The first day of Februarye the valiaunt knight sir Robert Jerningham and with him fiftie Demilaunces of the garison of Calice skoured the countrye to Odinsaell and there tooke a hundred hedde of Beastes, by that doing an alarye rose throughe the country, wherby the Frenchmen gathered together to the number of twelue score, and or Sir Robert and his companye came to Houndingbridge they were beset rounde about, so that of necessitie they must fight, the Frenchmen set on with handgunnes, Crosbowes and pykes, and for a while there was a strong encounter, but the Englishmen as men desperate (because of the number) fought so fiersly that they caused the Frenchmen to geue backe and slew many of them and tooke. xiiij. prisoners, and in the chase they tooke seauen more which made vp one and twentie. Then the saide sir Robert retourned with his bootie and prisoners and lost no man, but almost all were hurt.

The. x. day of March the king hauing a new harnesse made of his owne deuise and fashion, such as no Armorer before that time had seene, thought to assay the same at the tilte, and appointed a Justes to serue him. On foote were appointed the Lorde Marques Dorset and the Erle of Surrey, the king came to the one ende of the tilte, and the Duke of Suffolk to the other: then a Gentleman sayd to the Duke, sir the king is come to the tiltes ende. I see him not sayd the Duke on my faith, for my Headpeece taketh from me my sight: with these wordes God knoweth by what chaunce, the King had his speare deliuered him by the Lorde Marques, the viser of his Headpeece being vp & not downe nor fastened, so that his face was cleane naked. Then the Gentleman sayde to the Duke, sir the king commeth, then the Duke set forewarde and charged his speare, and the king likewise vnaduisedly set toward to the Duke: the people perceiuing the kinges face bare, cryed hold, holde, the Duke neyther saw nor heard, and whether the king remembred that his visar was vp or no, few we could tell: Alas what sorrow was it to the people when they saw the spleters of the Dukes speare strike on the Kinges Hedpeece: for on a suertie the Duke strake the king on the browe right vnder the defence of the Headpeece on the very coyfe, scull, or basenetpeece wherunto the barbet for power or defence is charneld, to which coyfe or basenet neuer Armorer taketh heede, for it is euermore couered with the visar, barbet and volant peece, and so that pece is so defended that it forceth of no charge: But when the speare on that place lighted, it was great ieoperdie of death insomuch that the face was bare, for the Dukes speare brake all to shyuers, and bare the kinges visar or barbet so farre backe by the counter buffe that all the kinges Headpece was full of spleters. The Armorers for this matter were much blamed, and so was the Lord Marques for the deliuering of the speare when his face was open, but the king saide that none was to blame but himselfe, ſelfe, for he entended to haue ſayed himſelfe and his ſight. The Duke incontinently vnarmed him, and came to the king, ſhewing him the cloſeneſſe of his ſight, and ſware that he would neuer runne againſt the king more: But if the king had beene a litle hurt, the kinges ſeruauntes would haue put the Duke in ieoperdy.

Then the king called his Armorers and put all his peces together and then tooke a ſpeare and ranne fiue courſes very well, by the which all men might perceiue that he had no hurt, which was great ioye and comfort to all his ſubiectes there preſent.

In this yere the king ſent the Lorde Morlay, ſir William Hoſy knight, and Doctor Lee his Almoner to Done Ferdinando Archeduke of Auſtrich, and brother to the Emperor Charles, with the order of the Garter, which in the towne of Norymberge receyued the ſame, where then were all the princes of Germanie aſſembled at a counſail or dyet, againſt the biſhop of Rome, againſt whom the Germaynes put a hundred grieues.

The.xiij. day of Aprill one Capitaine Bzearton one of the Capitaines of the aduenturers at Guyſnes with.xvj. tall men, came to a village called Waſte, and there tooke a bootie of beaſtes, by which taking an alarie aroſe, and by chaunce certaine of the garriſon of Bulleyn were then abroade, and by the cry of the people came where the Engliſhe men were, the Frenchmen were two hundred horſemen, and with great cryes enuironed the Engliſhe men about, ſo that the Engliſhemen could make no defence. Then Capitain Bzearton called to the Capitaine of the Frenchemen, and ſayde, ſir I am a Gentleman, and this enterprice was mine, I haue brought theſe good fellowes to this ieopardie, wherefore we yeelde vs all priſoners to you, and ſo they deliuered their weapons, the Capitaine was a Gentleman and gently them receyued, then to the men of warre drewe all the peyſantz or churles of the Countrey nye hande to the number of.vij.or.viij.score, which deſyred to bye the Engliſhemen that were taken, the Frenchemen were content, and tooke money, then the Engliſhmen were deliuered to the vplandiſhe people, and the men of warre roade away.

When the men of warre were departed the rybaudes with Pykes, Jauelyns, and knyues, fell on the Engliſhmen which had no weapon, & them ſlue all.xvij. and cut them in pieces the moſt ſhamefully that euer was ſeene. Capitaine Bzearton murdered.

When knowlege hereof was brought to the Capitaine of Guiſnes ſir John Gage, he ſent for the aduenturers, willyng them to reuenge their Capitaynes death. So all the aduenturers the.xiij. day gathered together to the number of.xl. archers and pykes, and by good guyde the next day in the morning they came to the ſame village of Waſt, and there toke.xxxvij. priſoners, and moſt part were at the murder of Bzearton and his company, and of the.xxxvij. they ſlue.xxxj. and ſo they left one, and caryed him with them, but or they departed they ſet the towne on fyre, and ſpared nothing, their yre was ſo great: the men of warre of Fraunce coſted the Engliſh men, but they would not meddle with them in that rage. The murder reuenged.

When they came to Guyſnes they ſware the Frenchman that was left on liue, to declare their meſſage to the Capitaine of Bulleyn, which was that after that day they would ſaue neyther man, woman, nor childe, that came to their handes for the great crueltie that the Peyſantz had done to Capitaine Brerton and his companye, wyth which message the Frenchemen were discontent, and sayde that the villaynes deserued to haue vengeaunce for their crueltie.

In this yere through bookes and Pronostications made and calculate by Astronomers, the people were sore afrayd for the sayd wryters declared, that this yere should be such Eclipses in watry signes, and such coniunctions, that by waters and floods many people should perish. Insomuch that many persons vittayled themselues and went to high groundes for feare of drowning, and specially one Bolton, which was Prior of Saint Bartholomewes in west Smithfield in London, builded him an house vpon Harow of the hill, onely for feare of this flood, and thether he went and made prouision for all thinges necessary within him, for the space of two Monethes: But the faithful people put their trust & confidence only in God. And this raine was by the wryters pronosticate to be in Februarye, wherefore when it began to raine in Februarye, the people were much afrayde, and some sayde now it beginneth, but many wise men which thought that the worlde coulde not be drowned againe, contrary to Goddes promise, put their trust in him onely, but because they thought that some great raynes might fall by inclinations of the stars, and that water mylles might stande still and not grynde, they prouided for meale, and yet God be thanked there was not a fairer season in many yeres, and at the last the Astronomers for their excuse sayde, that in their computation, they had mistaken and miscounted in their number an hundred yeres.

Bolton prior of saint Bartholomewes buylded a house vpon Harowe of the hill for feare of a flood.

The Emperour Charles which also was enemy to the French king, seeyng the great armye that the King of Englande his confederate had in Fraunce, thought it was to him honorable to make warre also on that part of Fraunce that ioyneth to Spaine, and in especially he imagined how to recouer the towne of Fountraby, which the Frenchmen before that tyme had gotten: wherefore he assembled a great puissaunce, and made Capitaine the Lorde Barnardine de Belasco Constable of Castile, which with great diligence came before the towne of Fountraby which was strongly fortefyed, and the Capitaine thereof was a Nauerois: but when the Capitaine and his company saw the towne besieged with such a puyssance, and also that the sea was so narrowly kept that they could not haue vittaile nor succor, they determined to geue vp the towne: but yet the Capitaine of a high stomack shot out his ordinaunce, and sent his trompet to the Capitain of the Spaniardes to know what prisoners he had of his, and for the communication thereof he desyred abstinence of warre till he had commoned with the Counsaile of the Spanishe hoste, which to him was graunted. Then was communication for fiue dayes, and nothing ended, for the Spaniardes were haute on the one syde, and the Frenchmen prowde on the other syde, but on the firt day it was concluded that the towne should be delyuered wyth ordinaunce and Artillarie, and all the men of warre to depart with bagge and baggage, and so the .xxbij. day of Februarye was the towne of Fountraby brought againe to the handes of the Emperour, and he that was Capitaine of Fountraby was afterwarde restored to his landes in Nauerre by the Emperour, and became his man.

The Bishop of Rome called Pope Clement seeyng the great warres that were this yere on all parties, and in especiall betwene the Emperour and and the king of Englande on the one partie, agaynst Fraunces the Frenche king and his alyes, sent an Archebishop of the realme of Naples first to the French king, and after to the Emperour, which declared to the French king the manifold mischiefes that ryse by warre, the great stroke of vengeaunce that God will strike for vniust warre and specially for the death of innocents and effusion of Christen blood, and shewed farther, that the sayd French king made dayly warre on the Emperor, and the king of England without cause, but only because he himselfe would do no right to them, nor to their subiectes.

An Archebishop sent from the Pope to entreat peace betwene the Emperor and king of England & the French king.

The French king after counsaile taken aunswered, my Lorde Legate, we assure you that we make no warre, but warre is made on vs, & we stand at the defence, notwithstanding our right is kept from vs, both the Duchy of Millain, and realme of Naples, by the Emperour, and the vsurped Duke, to the which we haue good tytle, and the king of England warreth on vs without cause, notwithstandyng that we haue geuen hym and many Lordes of his Counsaile diuers kayre pencions, not because we be afrayde of hym, but because we woulde haue his loue and amitie, & when we perceyued that he toke part with the Emperor our mortal enemy, we withdrew our pencions as with right we might, and now with all his power he would conquere our good will, which is against reason, and we claime nothing of him. Well sayd the Ambassador, I will first speake with the Emperor, & after with the king of England, and then I will declare to you theyr rightes and demaundes, with which the French king semed to be content.

Then the sayde Ambassadour tooke his leaue and in post came to the Emperour in Spaine, and there exhorted him to peace with many goodly reasons, affirmyng that the warre was vniust and without reasonable cause made on the French king, as the sayd king affirmed. Then the Emperour like a noble prince aunswered, that the warres were neuer of his beginning: For the French king or he wist had taken the towne of Fountraby, and also had sent an army to conquere the realme of Nauerne, and not with this contented, retayned the Swyches which be the Emperours subiectes, and caused them to be enemyes to the Empyre, and he also withhelde the Duchie of haute Burgoyne, and the Countie of Arthoys with diuers other Countries, and seignories belongyng to him: wherfore his quarell was alway iust, and because the College of Rome should perceiue ꝑ whole cause of his warres, he deliuered to ꝑ said Ambassador a scedule, with which he departed, refusing all giftes which the Emperor offered him, & came again to the French king, and rehersed to him the Emperors saiyng, but the french king himselfe highly excused and sayd, that he might not lese that that his predecessors left him, & so the Bishop of Romes Ambassador tooke his leaue and came into England.

In the beginning of this .xvj. yere, the king lay at his Maner of Newhall in Esser, and there kept the feast of saint George, and hearing that the Bishop of Romes Ambassador was comming into Englande, remoued to his Maner of Grenewiche where the sayde Archebishop and Legate came to him, and was highly entertayned, which declared wisely and eloquently the message and entent of his maister, which was to make a peace and concorde betwene the princes of christendome, and especially betwene the Emperor, the king of England and the French king, & for that cause he had bene with the Emperor, & also with the French king, which as he sayde affirmed, that without cause the king of Englande made on him warre, consideryng that he to the intent to haue the more amitie and fauor of you and your nobles hath liberally geuen to you and them honorable pencions, which by no duetie as he affirmeth you can nor may clayme, but of his beneuolence and bountie. Also he sayeth that you claime his crowne, realme, and possessions, which toucheth him highly, and of yours he claymeth nothing, and therefore he thinketh of right you ought not to make him warre. Wherefore maye it please your highnesse to tell me your mind, and I shal it declare to the whole Court of Rome God wylling and forget nothing.

A declaration of the kinges right to the crowne of Fraunce, and to the tribute of the same and certain other rightes.

Then the kyng called to him his counsayle and after diuers consultations had, the Ambassador was sent for, and there was shewed to him many recordes, prouing the king of Englande to be inheritour to the realme of Fraunce by bloud, and also confirmed by dyuers Charters in the time of king Charles the seuenth. And as concernyng the pencion, to him was shewed dyuers Charters, that it was no pencion of friendship, but due rent for the Duches of Normandie and Guyan, and the Countries of Iniow and Maine, which are the king of Englandes verie enheritaunce. Farthermore there were shewed to him diuers bondes of the sayde French kinges for the payment for the Citie of Tournay, and other duties which he ought to the king of Englande, all which articles to fulfill, the French king hath oftentimes bene required by Ambassadors, and yet he euer dissembled, and would not conforme himselfe to reason: of all these things were notes written and deliuered to the Bysshop of Romes Ambassadour, which tooke his leaue of the king and returned in post accompanyed but with three persons. By reason of the comming of this Ambassador men hoped that peace should ensue, but it succeeded not this yere: for the thirde daye of Maye the garrison of Bulleyne with dyuers other in the most secret wise that coulde be, came to a place within the Englishe pale called Sentricas, and sodainely strake vp a Dromme or Drounslade: the people hearing this in the night were sore abashed, some fled naked and some clothed, the most part fled to the Churche, and the Frenchemen them folowed, and tooke. xxi. prisoners, and then set fyre on the Churche: By this time was all the pale rayled, which thing the Frenchmen perceyuing, left their bootie and returned in all haste with their prisoners to Bulleyn.

Tirwyn besieged.

In this season the Lordes of Flaunders laye at the siege before Tyrwyn, and were lykely to haue taken it by famine, whereof the French king beyng aduertised assemb'ed an armie of. xxij. thousand horsemen and footemen vnder the conduit of the Duke of Uandosme, and the Lord Dountorny, and the French king himselfe came downe to Amyas, and there caused it to be noysed that he would besiege the towne of Ualencyen in Henaude, where the Duke of Suffolke the last yere had left the king of Englandes ordinaunce. The king of England hearing of this, sayde, that if the French king besieged Ualencyen, he in person would go thether for to rescue hys ordinaunce. The Lorde Fynes and other Lordes of Flaunders which laye before Tyrwyn with. ix. thousand men were aduertised of the French armye, but because of the fame that the hoste should go to Ualencyen, they sent for no more succours.

lencyen and toke the way directly to Tyrwyn. When the Lordes of Flaunders perceyued that, they were sore abashed, and then they knewe that they were deceyued, and that they were not able to abide the puyssaunce of the French armie. Wherefore they raysed their siege, and put themselues in order of battayle on the Southeast side of Tyrwyn: the French armie passed forward the sixt day of Maye toward Tyrwyn and made no semblaunce to fight: Howbeit some of them skirmished with the horsemen of Flaunders, but they at the last entered the towne, whereunto they were welcome, and the Lordes of Flaunders departed sore displeased, but there was no remedie. Then ranne a brute that the French army would lay siege to Guysnes: wherefore the king caused men and all other things to be put in a readinesse for the speedie rescue thereof if it had so chaunced. But the Frenchmen tooke a better aduise.

In this Month of May syr Robert Iernyngham Capitaine of Newnam bridge commoned with Christopher Coo, a Capitayne of diuers Englishe ships that kept the Sea, which then was in Calice hauen for vitayle, and sayde, Capitaine Coo you know how the Bulleyners haue visited nere to Calice the Englishe pale, and haue burned Sentreas. If you will promise to set many of your men a lande at the hauen of Bulleine the .xix. daye of Maye, I with as manye as I can furnishe will meete with you there in Base Bulleyne at the time and houre betweene vs appointed, to the which the sayde Christopher agreed and faythfully promised, and so prepared accordingly euery thing necessarie and so sayled toward Bulleyn, syr Robert Iernyngham sent worde of this enterprise to syr William Fitzwilliam Capitaine of Guysnes to know if he would aide any part toward this iourney, which sent worde that he would be at the same auenture himselfe: then all the gentlemen desired him to be Captaine of that enterprise, which he thankfully and with hart receyued: then all the men of warre and the aduenturers and the Baylie of Marke assembled together, so that when all were come together, they were three hundred horsemen, and of the Countrey and Marke three hundred and of the auenturers. C. lx. and so one an other they were seuen hundred men. All these persons met at an houre appointed at Sandyngfield: the night was short so that it was daye or they came neere Bulleyne all set in good order of battayle, but they were aserted before they came nere Bulleyne, and so it chaunced that Christopher Coo with his ships which had winde at will, was come with his foure shippes before Bulleyne somewhat before day, the Bulleners that kept the watch him espied, & then he manned his Boates and with men and ordinaunce stretched towarde the lande, by that time was all base Bulleine in harnesse readie to defende the Englishemen from landing, but Capitayne Coo did what he might, and almost all the people of Base Bulleyn were on the shore, that seyng the garrison, made them readie and bent their ordinaunce. Sir William Fitzwilliam hearing the Gonnes towarde the hauen side, knewe well that Christopher Coo was in his businesse, and so encouraged euery man to do well and marched forward with as much speede as might be, in so much that all the Englishe men were on the hilles before Bulleyne in sundry plumpes, then issued out the horsemen of Bulleyne betweene the Castell and Cardons Tower, the light horsemen of the English part them encountered, there was a good fight, the French men shot with Crosbowes, and the Englishe men wyth long bowes, and the great ordinaunce shot terribly, the English men approched the towne walles, this skirmishe was fierce and euer the archers ayded the horsemen. While the horsemen were thus skirmishyng, the eyght score aduenturers which were hardie and valyant men cast themselues about and came to base Bulleyne, and there they were hardily receyued of the French men, yet notwithstanding they lost their barriers and the English men entered, there was shooting on all sides, and a strong fight. The Frenchmen cryed Bulleyne, and the Englishe men saint George Calice: but at the last the Frenche men were driuen back and many slayne, and.xliiij. taken prisoners, and so they returned to their Capitaine syr William Fitzwilliam. All this while was Chrystopher Coo on land on the sea coast, and bet the French men vp to the towne, and when the tide turned, he with all hys came agayne in safetie to their shippes. The Englishe horsemen after long fightyng tooke three of the Frenchmen of armes, and the other reculed to the towne. By thys time by reason of the alarme was all the Countrie of Picardie raysed and much people resorted to Bulleyne on all sides, which doyng syr William Fitzwilliam wisely perceyuing, by the sounde of a Trumpet brought all his men together in a plumpe, and then sent them hither and thether to fet hys drifftes of beastes that were nere in the Countrie on euery side, which was quickly done, for the aduenturers brought Oxen, Kyne, Horses, and many other pillages, and brent the granges and villages, and so met together, and with their bootie returned in safetie.

The Tuesday folowyng, beyng the last day of May, syr William Fitzwilliam, with a hundred and fiftie horsemen, and the aduenturers, and a hundred other persons mo, came to a place called Samer de Boys, the sayde Capitayne wisely considered, that in that place the Frenchemen had dyuers times lurked, and taken at auauntage the Englishe men, wherefore he layde his horsemen, & his archers on horseback in a wood, in a waite if the french men folowed the stale: then he sent forth the aduenturers, which passed farther then the Capitaine would that they should haue done, and sodainly they were ascryed: then on came the Frenchmen, the aduenturers sware that they would not flie, but bent themselues to defend their enemies, which were three hundred horsemen. The Frenche men knewe well their hardinesse, but yet they called them Crakers, which by missoundyng was commonly called Krekers, for a suretie these men were hardie, and full of policie, and verie farre would ieoparde, the Frenchmen sent about a Valey, a hundred of the best horsemen, and two hundred footemen, then were the Krekers betwene two bendes of the french men: syr William Fitzwilliam, beyng assured of the conduit of the french men, much doubted the chaunce of the aduenturers, wherefore in great haste sent for his stale of horsemen that he had left couered: and the frenchmen that were before the Krekers, came and set on very fast, in hope of their horsemen that were gone about an hill in the Valey. The Englishemen them valiauntly defended, then as the horsemen had compassed the hill, the aduenturers were come on a playne: then the horsemen that were come to syr William Fitzwilliam, set on the french horsemen, there was a hard and a fierce encounter, for the french men fought sore, but at length they fled, and in the chase were taken, lvj. horsemen, and.xliiij. slaine

one and other, and many Englishe men sore hurt and dyuers slayne, thus the Krekers scaped a narow hazard.

In June, syr William Fitzwilliam, Capitayne of Gusines, syr John Wallop, and Sir John Gage, secretly called to them. ir. C. men of warre such as they trusted, and on Midsomer day, passed the lowe Countrie of Picardie vnto the Castell of Hardyngham, or Rigsam and they caried with them but one piece of ordinaunce called a Curtall, thys Gonne they bent against the castel, which was well furnished with harnesse, ordinaunce, and al other artilierie, and things needefull, and the Capitayne also was a valyant and hardie gentleman. The Englishmen euer shot that peece and remoued it from place to place with great paine, & in conclusion made a battery of the walles, so that they might assault it, then the Trumpet blewe to the assault, and the Capitayne with his companye stoode at defence: then Syr John Wallop, & syr John Gage with the auenturers or Krekers entred the diche, and the archers shot at euery loupe arrowes, and the Frenchmen likewise shotte quarelles: the Englishemen set vp Ladders to the walles, but the Frenchemen threwe them downe, at this assault was slaine a Gentleman called Butler, and. xv. other Englishe men, but for all that the assault was not left, for some climed by pikes, and some amended the Ladders, and cryed againe to the assault: but sir William Fitzwilliam chiefe Capitaine of this enterprise, perceyued that they lacked engynes and other thinges for the spedie assault of the Castell, and not willyng to lose his men without cause, caused them to stay, while he and other Capitaynes counsayled together, and as they were concluded once againe to attempt the assault, they heard newes that two thousand horsemen, and two thousand footemen, were at hande to fight with them, they then perceiuyng that nine hundred men beyng wery, were no power to encounter wyth foure thousand Frenchmen, they in good order returned to the English Fortresses.

Mounsire de Bees Capitaine of Bullieme, well considered all the enterprices, that the Englishmen had done in Picardy and Fraunce, now of late: he determined to requite them, to his honor and fame, and for that purpose, sent for the Erle of Dampmartine, the Lorde Pountremie, and the Lorde Chastillion, which concluded to enter the English pale, and to shew themselues before Calice. Wherefore they assembled all the men of armes and Souldiers, of the garrisons about and so they were. viij. hundred good horsemen, and with Pikes, Gunnes, and Crossebowes. viij. hundred footemen: and when all this company was assembled Mounsire de Bees as Capitaine of this iourney, with the other Lordes, the fourth daye of August wyth banner displayed, came towarde Calice in the euening: and the next daye in the morning by six of the clocke, they came to a village within the Englishe pale, called Bonynges. Then the Alarme rose through al the English pale, and so came to Calice. These lordes of Fraunce sent out their forriders to serch and ouer see the country, & then they laide an embushement of three hundred horsemen, at the said towne of Boninges, and with that bend abode Mounsire Pountremy and Mounsire de Bees rode to Kalkewel with three hundred freth horsemen, and all the footemen with banner displayed, and forraged all the Country, of which three hundred speres, they let one hundred go at large and kept the residue with them.

When

When the Alarme came to Calice, euery man made to horse and harnesse. Then sir Robert Jerningham with .xxx. horsemen with all speede, rode out of Calice to beholde the companie of the Frenchmen. And he sent forth hys light horsemen, which met with the skourers of the French men, and because the French men semed a fewe in number, the Englishe forerynders prosered toward them, which fledde towarde Sandiffielde, and the Englishemen chased after, not beyng of knowlege of the embushements, that lay at Bonynges, and Kalkewell.

When sir Robert Jernyngham sawe his light horsemen chase, he folowed after soft, to kepe his horse in brethe. Then sodainly the Frenche men that were in chase returned, for some of their ayde was nere them. When the Englishemen which passed not .xvj. horse, sawe the Frenchmen returne, they encountered with them manfully, but to the Frenchemen came still mo and mo, so that the Englishemen were constrayned to flie another way, to the hye land in great ieopardie, for the Frenchmen them pursued, but by the helpe of the light Geldynges, the Englishemen gat the Sea syde, or sea sandes beyonde Skales: Then were the Englishemen glad and returned, and fought with the Frenchemen hande to hande, for the Frenchemen behinde folowed not the chase, but onely twentie horsemen, and with pure fightyng the Englishemen tooke one of the Frenche horsemen, and came with hym to Calice, and so were saued.

When sir Robert Jernyngham sawe his men in chase (as you haue heard) and sawe that they were in great ieopardie, he aduaunsed for theyr rescue all that he might, which was the sauyng of the light horsemen, for the French men left them, to encounter with sir Robert Jerningham, and so it was that he went so farre forwarde, that the Frenchmen were betweene him and Calice. And when he sawe all the bendes and embushments breake out, he sayd to his companie: ries Saint George to borow, let these French galantes know what we English men be: Sir sayd his companie, they shall buy vs dere. Then he marched towarde the high lande: Then approched a great number of horsemen of Fraunce, the Englishmen them valiauntly receyued, and manfully defended, but euer the Frenchmen came fresh and fresh, so that the Englishemen beyng werye and oppressed with multitude, were faine to flie: and in this chase was taken Thomas Cheyney an Archer, whose horse was tyred, and two other Archers on horsebacke, one called George Barre, and the other Rowlande Atkinson, and three other of the Englishe pale: sir Robert and the remnaunt saued themselues the best that they couldе.

When sir Robert was returned, the Frenchmen sowned their trompet, and reculed to Bulleyn, and sent worde to Calice, that they would visit them oftener. Sir Robert Jerningham remembryng this chaunce, thought to be reuenged of the same, and so aduisyng himselfe to what place hee should repare, he remembred that when soeuer the Englishmen made any tourney to Marguyson, the Frenchmen would flie ouer the water or creke, to a highe ground by botes, and there as it were in an Iland saue themselues, because on that syde they might euer haue succors, for the creke or water, is beyonde the towne of Calice. Therefore the sayd sir Robert caused fiue great boates to be caryed in Wagons, and so he with other Capitaynes, of Calice, and Guisnes, to the number of thre hundred fotemen, with the kreekers, and .lx. horsemen the .xij. day of August, with Banners displayed, tooke their way to the towne of Margison, and in the night the light horsemen gaue alarme to the towne of Bulleyn, and tooke two Bouldoures prisoners, and brought with them certaine Cattaile to their companie. Then the Englishmen marched forward, towarde Margison, that seyng the Frenchmen, tooke their Boates in trust of the water, and passed ouer, the Englishemen perceiued that, and launced their Boates, and so like aduenturers entered, and by force passed, and so mo and mo, till a hundred .lx. were passed ouer: the Countrey began to gather, so that the Frenchmen were three hundred, which fought with the Englishmen, and would haue letted the Boates to land, but the Archers on the other syde draue them backe, and the Englishmen slue at the first encounter .lx. men, and tooke .xl. prisoners, yet the Frenchmen that fled met with new succors, and then began a new battail, and the Frenchmen fought hardily, but at the ende they fled, the most poorest of the people, on the other syde of the water, fled to the Church, and abode at their defence, then was there fyre set in the Church, then the French men lept out of the Church, to their destruction, for of three hundred there was saued but sixtie on liue.

Guisnes,

The whole power of Bulleyn was come downe, nere to the place: but when they perceyued that it was to late, and that the Englishemen were returned, they came no further. Thus was sir Robert Iernyngham euen with the Frenchmen, and brought a good bootie, and many prisoners to Calice, which sore grieued the Capitaine of Bulleyn.

The Frenchmen perceiuyng, that they gat little at the Englishmens handes, thought to take their aduauntage of the Fleminges, wherefore they assembled of the garrisons, of Bulleyn and Tirwyn, fiue hundred footemen, and three hundred horsemen, and so in good order marched toward saint Omers & they sent to go a forraging one hundred fotemen, and as many horsemen, and the rest kept themselues in a stale. These Frenchmen came by Arras, nigh to saint Omers, and forraged all the Countrie, the alarme spring al the Countrie to Turnahan, the Capitaine of Turnahan sent worde to sir William Fitzwilliam, Capitaine of Guisnes, that the Frenchmen were abroade, which made answere, that if the Frenchmen came nere to him, surely he would speake with them, with which answere the Capitaine of Turnahan beyng encouraged, sent forth two hundred Fleminges on foote, still the Frenchmen marched toward Turnahan, the Flemynges that were sent from Turnahan, marched toward the waye, where the Frenchmen shoulde come, thinking that when the Capitaine of Guisnes had set on them, that then they would haue lyen in the chase at the receipt.

The sayd Capitaine of Guisnes valiauntly marched forwarde, with a hundred horsemen and foure hundred footemen, entending to meete with the Frenchemen, and sodainely as he was passing forwarde, worde was brought him that the Erle of Damarten, with the garisons of Mustrel and Bouile, to the nũber of vj. C. horsemen, were cõming forward toward Guysnes. This heering sir William Fitzwilliam, sware that the Erle should not take paine to come to Guysnes, for he would meete him on the way: by this meane he left his first enterprise, & marched toward the Erle of Damartin.

The Frenchmen of Tirwin being thereof aduertised by a Spye, called all all the people together, and with their bootie came on forwarde towarde Turnahan, and sodainely they assayed the poore Fleminges, which were sent out of the Castell of Turnahan, and when they perceyued the Frenchmen, comming toward them, they turned their backes, and fled like sheepe: the Frenchmen folowed a pace, & slue the most part of them, for few escaped.

The Capitaine of Guysnes came to a fayre Greene, fiue myle from Guysnes, and there in good order of battayle, taried for the Erles comming, which heering that the Capitaine of Guysnes, was readie to receiue hym, made his returne backeward, without any thing doing: when the Capitaine knew the truth of the Erles returne, he then in all hast, sped hym to meete with the Frenchmen, that were comming to Turnahan, and in the meane waye, he heard tidinges of the chaunce of the Fleminges, and how the Frenchmen were recuied toward Tirwin, which aduenture sore him displeased, but there was no remedy, wherfore he returned to Guysnes again, very sory that the Frenchmen went awaye vnfought withall: The Frenchmen litle medled after this time, wherefore let vs now returne, and shewe what warres were kept on the frontires, betwene England and Scotland, in this season.

The Scots inuadeth England.

The one and twentie day of Maye being Trinitie Sonday fiue hundred Scottes in the morning by seuerall fordes, entered into Englande, and laye couertly by the high waye, to distresse Marchauntes and Market men, that should passe to Berwike, that day to the faire: for euery Trinitie Sonday, there is kept a great Fayre, which the Scottes knew well, and as they lay thus lurking, they robbed many Marchauntes, and tooke rich prisoners but at the last they were perceyued, then the Alarme rose, and people began to gather, the Scottes drew together toward Branxstone, and the Englishmen them assayled, which so manfully them defended, that if the yong Lorde of Fulbery, had not come with one hundred lyght horsemen, the Scottes had gon away with their bootie, but then began a sore fight, many were hurt on both sides, and some slayne, and at the last the Scottes fled, and in the chace there were two hundred Scottes taken prisoners, and the residue fled and saued themselues.

After this the fift daye of July, sir John a Fenwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and bastard Heron, and diuers other, gathered together. ix. hundred men and entred into Scotland, in the countrye called the Marche, and robbed and spoyled all the countrie, and by chaunce the same season, the Scots had assembled two thousand men, to inuade Englande, and none of these knewe of other, tyll they by aduenture met together. Then began a strong medlye, for the Scottes fought valiauntly a great while, and the Englishmen them hardely assayled, and at the last by fine force, caused them to leaue the grounde and flie, and in the fight were taken two hundred Scottes, and many slaine, of the which prisoners diuers were Gentlemen Sir Raufe of Fanwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and Bastard Heron, with .xxx. other Englishmen well horsed, folowed so far the chace, that they were past rescues of their company, which perceyuing the Scottes sodainly returned, and set on the Englishmen, which oppressed with multitude, were sone ouercome, and there was taken sir Raufe a Fanwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and syr other, and Bastard Heron, and seauen other slayne, the remnaunt by chaunce escaped:

ped: the other Englishmen with their two hundred prisoners, returned safely into Englande: the slaying of the Bastard Heron, was more pleasure to the Scottes, then the taking of the two hundred was displeasure, they hated hym so.

The seauenth day of July the Lorde Marwell of Scotlande, and Sir Alexander Iorden, with banner displayed, and Scottes to the number of foure thousand, entered into England at the west Marches by Carleile, and began to burne on euery syde: then the Englishmen assembled on euery side and so they were in number two thousand men, and fiersly set on the Scots, there was a great fight, for the space of an houre, at the last the Englishmen brake the array of the Scottes, and them discomfited, and tooke three hundred Scottes prisoners, the Englishmen that had taken prisoners, went away with their prisoners: For sir Alexander Iorden and his sonne & diuers were taken prisoners, & by their departing, the company of the Englishmen was much minished, the Lorde Marwell being a politique man, perceyuing that, and sodainly called his people together, and them encorraged, and began a new skirmishe, and recouered all the prisoners almost, and tooke diuers English men prisoners, this was the chaunce of warre.

A parliamẽt holden by the Scots sheweth many causes for the which they ought to beare with Fraunce before Englãd.

After this iourney, in the courte of parliament of Scotland, was much commoning of the warres, which were betwene Englande and Scotlande: some of the Nobles sayd, that Fraunce neuer did so much good to Scotland in twentie yeres, as Scotlande had lost by Englande, in one yere, for the loue and cause of Fraunce: wherefore they thought it conuenient to make a perpetuall league of amitie, with the king of Englande, and to leaue the Frenche kinges parte. Other Nobles which had pencions in Fraunce, declared the olde amitie betweene Fraunce and Scotlande, and how the French king, brought vp many Gentlemen of Scotlande in his Courte, geuing them great liuinges, which the king of Englande would not doe: they also alleged the franches, and priuileges that the Scottes haue in Fraunce, and specyallye they shewed, that if the kyng of Scottes shoulde breake with Fraunce, and then if it happened the king of England, to inuade Scotlande, which beyng without ayde of any friend, might well by the power of England be conquered. After many long reasons it was thought expedient, to sue to the king of England for a truce, which was done, and a truce graunted tyll saint Andrewes daye.

A Rose brought frõ Rome.

This yere the first day of September, was Doctor Thomas Hanibal Mayster of the Rolles, receyued into London, with Erles and Byshops, and diuers other nobles and gentlemen, as Imbassador from Clement Bishop of Rome, which brought with him a Rose of Golde (the which sayeth Sledane was consecrated as is accustomed three weekes before Easter) for a token to the king, of the great loue that he bare vnto him, the people as he passed thought to haue sene the Rose, but it was not shewed, till he came to the king to Wyndsore, on the day of the Natiuitie of oure Ladie, on which day after a solempne Masse song by the Cardinall of Yorke, the said present was deliuered to the king, which was a tree forged of fine gold, & wrought with branches, leaues and flowers, resembling Roses: this tree was set in a pot of Golde, which pot had three feete of antike fashion: the pot was of measure halfe a pinte, in the vppermost Rose, was a fayre Saphier loupe perced, the bignesse of an Acorne, the tree was of heigth halfe an Englishe yarde, and in bredth it was a foote. The sayd Ambassador in delyuering the same rose, made an oration, declaryng the good minde, loue and fauor, that the Bysshop of Rome bare to the king, in token whereof he sent him that present, which the king thankfully receyued, and deliuered it to him agayne, and so he bare it open before the king, from the College to the great chamber, and there deliuered it to the mayster of the Jewell house, and so there ended hys Legation.

Before this time in the Monyth of July, Lorde Archebalde Douglas Erle of Anguishe, which had maried the Queene of Scottes, sister to the king of Englande, and was sent into Fraunce by the Duke of Albany, and there kept, contrarie to hys will and pleasure, and from thence hardely escaped, and came to the king of Englande, to his manor of Grenewiche, and there besought him of his aide and comfort, to whom the king made a gentle aunswere. Thys Erle was not in the fauour of his wyfe the Queene of Scottes, wherefore she caused him to be sent into Fraunce: some sayd that she loued the Duke of Albany better then him, but whatsoeuer the matter was, she wrote to the french king, that if the Erle euer came againe into Scotlande, that the french king should haue no pleasure in Scotlande, that she might let, so that the Erle being in Fraunce, was in ieoperdie of his life. Wherefore secretly he fled and came into England as you haue heard, and one daye at the Castell of Wyndsore he declared, that in the counsayle of Fraunce when he was there, they happened in communication, to talke of the warres that were then, betweene the Emperour and the french king, and betwene the king of Englande and the french king: there was a Lorde of the counsayle that stood vp and sayde, it were better that one person suffered, rather then all the realme should be daylie in this mischiefe. Then was it asked, what he meant by that one person, he aunswered, that if the french Quene, which was lame and vgly were dead, that then wayes might bee found, that the french king should marry the Emperors sister, and to haue with her the Duchy of Millain, and then with the money of her mariage, the king of England should be payde, and so a peace might be concluded: to this no aunswere was made, but whether this were true or false, for a truth the french Queene was dead the.xvj.day of July, & was buried at S. Denise.

The Duke of Burbon this Sommer made sharpe warre on the french kings dominions, and did high enterprises: wherefore the king of Englande sent his letters to diuers Lordes and gentlemen in this season, the tenor wherof ensueth. Trusty. &c. For as much as (our Lord God be thanked) our armie, vnder the leading of our Cosyn the Duke of Burbon, hath not onely entered the rea'me of Fraunce, gainyng and attayning many townes, Cities, Castels, and places, with the whole countrie of Prouince, without anye resistance of our auncient enemie the french king, but also goeth daylie marchyng, and continually doth chace, and driue before them suche men of warre, as our sayd enemie hath prepared for his defence, in resistance of our Cosyn the Duke of Burbon, and our sayde armie. In such wise that it is thought vndoubtedly, nowe to be most conuenient time and season, eyther in our person (although the yere be somewhat past) or by a Lieutenaunt with a puyssaunt armie to inuade Fraunce on the other side, both for the recoucryng of the Crowne, and to compell our sayde enemy, to knowledge his obstinate, wilfull, and erronious demeanure, wherfore we will and commaund you to be readie with such power as you shall be able to make, upon the next proclamation to be made, dated the tenth day of September.

After which letters sent forth, euery man made preparation accordingly, and the people murmured and sayde, that it were much better, that the king should maintayne his warres with his awne subiectes, and spende his treasure on them, then to trust the Duke of Burbon, beyng a straunger to spende his money.

The king beyng at Wyndsore, to him came syr Anthony Fitz Herbert one of the Justices of the common place, a man of excellent learning in the lawe, as appereth by his workes, syr Rauf Egerton knight, Doctor Benton Deane of Lichfield, which in the beginning of thys yere, were sent as Commissioners into Irelande, which so wisely endeuored themselues, that they reformed manye iniuries done in the Countrie, and brought dyuers of the wilde Irishe by fayre meanes to a submission, and made by the kinges auctoritie, the Erle of Kildare deputie of the lande, before whom the great Oneele bare the sworde, and the Lorde Piers Butler, called Erle of Ormound, which was Deputie of Ireland, was by the sayde commissioners, made high Treasorer of Ireland. And when they had set all things in good order, in the Moneth of September they tooke shippyng, and in the same Moneth came to the king, which gaue them hys hartie thankes for their good doyngs.

In this Month the king sent maister John Magnus priest, and Roger Ratcliffe Esquier into Scotland, for the suretie of his nephewe the king of Scottes, for diuers Lordes of Scotland, wrote to the king, that they doubted the suretie of their king, because the Duke of Albanie, which was heyre apparaunt to the realme of Scotland, had the king in gouernaunce, and also they thought, he beyng a Frencheman borne, should not rule their realme: wherefore they amongest themselues, murmured sore in this matter. The Duke heering that the Lordes of Scotland, had written to the king of England, and also that they repyned and grudged at his doynges, sodainly with all the treasure that he could make, departed from Scotland, and sayled into Fraunce, with which departyng the Commons were nothing sory, and sone after his departyng, the Ambassadors of England were ioyously receyued into Scotland, and there the sayd Ambassadors tarryed, till Marche twelue moneth, in which tyme, there were many conclusions driuen, betweene the two realmes: now let vs returne to Fraunce.

The .xxiiij. day of September, three horsemen of the garrison of Bulleyn, which well knew the Hauen of Calice, came at a deepe tyde, and passed ouer Calice hauen, by Rise banke in the night, and went behinde the East Wyndmill, and then toke land, and went to a little village called Middleway, and passed the Turne pikes, and entred into a Wheelers house, and tooke the man and the wyfe, and .xx. pound in money sterlyng, and went away clere without aferie or perceiuyng of the watche of Calice, and no man wist where they were become, till the Trompet of Bullein brought worde, and demaunded the raunsome.

The last day of September, fiftie light horsemen of Calice, apperteynnyng to sir Robert Jernyngham, rode toward Bulleyn, and passed the water of Marquison, and came to the water of Sclakes nere Bulleyn, where sodeinly they encountered .ix. Frenchmen, of the garrison of Bulleyn, there was shotyng with long Bowes and Crosbowes on euery syde, strong was the fight, but at the last the Frenchmen fled, the Englishmen folowed, and tooke three light horsemen, and when they perceiued the alarme on euery side, they put themselues in array, and with their bootie came to Calice.

The same day sir Thomas Palmer, with .ix. horsemen of Gusnes, encountered with the Capitaine Bertram, leader of the horsemen of the Erle Dammartyn, with .ix. horsemen, there was a strong fight two houres together, but in the ende the Frenchemen fled, and the Englishemen folowed, and tooke .xxiij. prisoners, and .xxj. good horse, and with this bootie they returned to Gusnes.

In this busye season, the aduenturers heeryng what the horsemen on their parties had done, and especially perceiuyng that the English horsemen had taken good prisoners, communed amongest themselues, what was to be done: then one of their Capitaines sayd openly: sirs you see howe long we haue beene here, and wages we haue none, our liuyng ryseth on the gaine of our enemyes, and sith our beginnyng, we haue had good chaunce in all our enterprises, God be thanked: nowe the Winter draweth neere, let vs now aduenture to get some good bootie, to make vs merye with, in the colde weather, and if you will, we shall enterprise a thing, that I trust to vs shall be profitable. Then all the companie cryed forth, forth. Then with a Banner of saint George, they marched toward a village, lyeng tewarde Moustrell, hauyng only .xxb. light horsemen, to be their scourers, and they were not fully two hundred men. This companie folowyng their scourers, went farre on and had gotten a fayre bootie, of Oxen, kyne and other beastiall, and were nere at their returne, and by chaunce the same day, was the Erle of Dammartyn, & the Capitaine of Moustrell, with the power of the Duke of Uandosme, goyng toward Saint Omers, to burne and destroy that Countrey, and for that purpose they had gathered together .xb. hundreth horsemen, and eight hundreth footemen, howbeit, the footemen were a large mile behinde the horsemen.

The Frenchmen on horsebacke espyed the Englishe horsemen, which perceiuyng the great number fled, and as the sayd Frenchmen marched forward, they espied the aduenturers on foote, and made toward them: the Englishmen seeyng the great number of the horsemen, studied to get some hedge, or strong place to fortifie them, but there was no such place in sight, and also they had no such tyme so to do, wherefore the Capitain sayd: Good felowes and brethren, we haue of long time bene called aduenturers, now is the time come of our aduenture, the Frenchmen will not raunsome vs for nothing, we be amongest them so feared: if any thing saue our lyues, it must be God and our hardinesse, and therefore sayd he, if you see me begin to flie, slay me out of hand. Then euery man cryed God mercy, and made themselues prest to the defence.

The Frenchmen came on, on euery syde, the Englishmen shot their arrowes, and defended them aswell as they coulde: the Frenchemen perceyuyng that the Englishemen kept themselues so close, caused diuers of the horsemen horsemen to light a foote, and so they did, and fought with their speares agaynst the pykes, and shot with Crosbowes, on euery syde. Alas the while, for while the Englishmen had arowes to shote, they were not broke, but close without perill, but when their arrowes were spent, the Englishmen fought valiauntly, and slue many Frenchmen that lighted on foote, but in the conclusion the horsemen entered, and killed them all in maner, because there were so many of their company slaine, and tooke few of them prisoners. This was the end of these Companions, called the krekers or aduenturers, which were as hardie men, as euer serued Prince or Capitaine. The end of ye aduenturers.

The Duke of Burbon, with the Marques of Picardie, in the moneth of October, with a great puyssaunce, layd siege to the strong towne of Marcell in Prouince, and lay there a great space. The French king raised a great armie, and sware that he would rayse the siege, whereof heeryng the Duke of Burbon, sent for the Marques of Piscare, and his other Capitaynes, and declared to them that his entent was to giue the French king battaile: the Marques of Piscare sayde that the French kinges puyssaunce was great, and theirs small, and sayde: although the Duke of Burbon, which was a banished man from his Countrie, had no other remedie to reuenge him, but by battaile, yet he said he would not put all the Emperours men, of the which he had the guide, in such a hazard, till the remnaunt of the Emperours power were come. Well sayde the Duke of Burbon, then you do not as you haue written, both to the Emperour, and to the king of England, which shall be a reproche to your honour: Nay sayd the Marques, I will kepe me from reprothe. Then sayd Doctor Richard Pace, Imbassador for the king of England: my Lorde you haue had the king my Maysters wages, I would be glad to heare what way you would take: I will tell you sayd the Marques, the french king hath a great armie gone into Italy, and he himselfe foloweth with another, not to come to fight with vs, I dare assure you: but only to take the Duchie of Millaine vnprouided, which shall do him more pleasure then he had slaine all vs. Also the Emperour shall leese more then ten Marceles be worth, and the French kinges power shall be more elated, that he will not set by the Emperour, nor the king of England. Therefore my aduice is, to breake vp this siege, and with all speede to preuent him in Italy, and if we be entered the townes, and put munitions in the same, he shall lye a colde in the fieldes, and then you shall see what shall become of him, when his beastes dye, and his vittayle spent. To this counsaile the Duke and all the Capitaines agreed, and so brake vp the siege, and with all hast departed into Italy, and fortified all the townes in the Duchie of Millain, with men and other necessaryes.

The French king heeryng of this, with all his army passed the Mountaynes and camped nere to Millain. It chaunced in this Moneth of November the .xiij. day, about the towne of Calice, there fell a great mist, in which mist the Frenchmen came to a village called kause beside Newnam bridge, and tooke .xl. beastes, then the Alarme was brought to Calice, which heeryng, the Marshall of Calice, called to him sir Robert Jerningham, and they had with them a .C. .xx. horsemen, and sent sir Anthonie Browne to tell the Capitain of Guisnes, what they entended to doe, but they tarryed not for the companie of Guisnes, but marched so farre forward, that they came to the water of Sclakes, which is nere Bulleyn, and there they set their stale. And in the morning betime, they sent forth a Gentleman called Richard Lambert with .xx. light horsemen on swift Geldinges, and they came by moone lyght nere Bulleyn, and then they sawe the men of Bulleyn and other thereabout put out their beastes into the field. Then the Englishemen with great diligence brought all the beastes together, and so began to drive them together toward their embushment. Then the alarme began at Bulleyn, and the men of warre issued out of the towne, and fought with the Englishmen, their horses were fresshe: wherefore they had a great aduauntage, but in conclusion three Frenchmen were slaine, and their horses taken, and so the light horsemen came with their cattaile, nere to the embushment, and the Frenchmen folowed, that seyng, the Englishmen that kept the stale, came in all haste and rescued their light horsemen, and drave the Frenchmen backe, and then made returne with their beastes, and as they were returning, they had worde brought to them, howe that sir William Fitzwilliam Capitaine of Guisnes with his retinue, were besiegyng a pile called the Castell of Capell, wherefore they sped them thether in all hast, and when they were come thether, the Capitaine of Guysnes them hartily welcomed, and then they concluded to give an assault to the Castell, and so with good courage set on, the frenche men defended it very valiauntly a great while, but at the last the Englishmen gat ouer the ditches, and scaled the walles, but the Frenchmen still them defended, till the Englishmen had gotten to the highest of the Dungion, and then was there slayng a pace. For there were .liii. persons slaine out of hand, in reuengyng the great obstinacie of the Frenchmen, and the Castell was rased and brent. Then sir William Fitzwilliam with his bootie, and sir John Wallop Marshall of Calice, and sir John Jernyngham returned, he to Guisnes, and they to Calice. The same day. xiiij. Burgonions, and. xiij. Spaniardes, all horsemen of Guisnes, came to the Church of Falske, not far from Durnam at high Masse tyme, and there drewe their swordes, and so much did, that all the men in the Church, to the number of fiftie, yelded themselues prisoners, of the which number they tooke eight persons with them, which shoulde be gages for the remnant, and with these eight they came to Guisnes.

The .xix. day of December were receiued into London, Lorde Gilbert Keuet Erle of Castelles, sir Robert Cockeburne Bishop of Dunkell, and the Abbot of Campskenell, Imbassadors from James the fift king of Scottes, by the Bishop of Lyncolne, the Lord of Saint Jhones, and diuers other noble men, and were conueyed to their lodgynges at Taylers Hall.

The .xxiij. daye of December, the sayde Imbassadors were conueyed to Grenewiche, accompanied with the sayd Lordes by water, and when they came to the bitter gate, they were receyued of the officers of the house, and so passed through the haule, which was well furnished with people, and so through the vttermost chamber, into the great chamber of presence, where they were receyued and welcomed of all the Princes and Nobles of the realme, and within a short space the king came foorth, and set himselfe in a throne of three steps high, vnder his cloth of estate, which was very riche, but his apparell was exceeding rich, both of Goldsmithes worke and perle, and stone, which the Scottes well auised, and then they wisely and humbly made made their obeyſaunce, and the Byſhop in good playne Latine made a ſolempne oȝation, in the which he declared, that although the realme of Scotlande and he had often times heard the renoume and fame of hym and hys Court, both foȝ the giftes of grace and nature, which were in his perſon, yet he ſayde that his pȝincely countenance, his louely fauoȝ, which he himſelfe did ſee, did much ſurmount the fame and name, which he hath heard of repoȝt. He declared further, that although foȝtune had him fauoȝed in conquering of regions, and vanquiſhing of battayles, yet that thing was not ſo honoȝable to hym, noȝ pȝofitable to his realme, as was a good peace, which pleaſeth both God and man, and foȝ that cauſe he ſhewed, that king James the fift his Nephewe and felow to the king of Englande, had ſent them his Imbaſſadours, to entreate a peace, ſo that a conuenient mariage might be made, betwene him and the Ladie Marie daughter to the king, which ſhould be a linck neceſſarie, to knit together the realme of Scotland and Englande, in perpetuall loue and amitie.

To which oȝation, the Byſhop of London Doctoȝ Tunſtall aunſwered and ſayde: that the king was at their deſire, content to haue peace vpon reaſonable conditions, and as touchyng mariage of his daughter, he woulde ſo anſwere them, that they ſhould be contented. Then ȳ king roſe from his place and welcomed them, and all the honeſt perſons of the traine, and after communication had, they toke their leaue foȝ that time, and ſo toke their Barge and came to London.

Friday the.xxx. day of December the Erle of Caſtelles one of the Scottiſhe Imbaſſadoȝs tooke his leaue and departed toward Scotlande: foȝ to commen with the counſayle of Scotland, foȝ things which were not in their commiſſion, and left behinde him the Byſhop of Dunkell, and the Abbot of Campſkenell: ſome ſayde the article was, that the Scottes ſhould foȝſake the French king, and that the king of Scottes ſhould come into Englande, but whatſoeuer it was euery man knewe it not.

In thys Moneth the Cardinall as Legate, by his power Legantyne, would haue viſited the Friers Obſeruauntes, but they in no wiſe woulde therein condiſcende, wherefoȝe.xix. of the ſame religion, were accurſed at Paules Croſſe, by one of the ſame religion, called Fryer Foȝeſt. Of thys Fryer Foȝeſt ye ſhall here moȝe hereafter, in the thirtie yere of thys king.

The Obſeruaunt Friers would not obey the Cardinall.

In thys ſeaſon the French king was in Italy with all his Nobilitie, and to him was Millaine yeelded, but becauſe of peſtilence he would not enter, but departed and layde ſiege to the ſtrong towne of Pauia, whereof was Capitayne a valyaunt Spanyard called Anthony de Leua. The Frenche kings mother beyng Regent of Fraunce, perceyuing that the king her ſonne with all his good Capytaynes were in Italy, doubted that the king of Englande, in the next ſpȝing time would inuade Fraunce. Wherefoȝe thee by the aduiſe of the counſayle of Fraunce, did ſo much with the king of Englande, that her Stuard of houſhold called John Jokin, had a ſafeconduit to come into Englande, which was kept cloſe in the houſe of Doctor Larke, a Pȝebendarie of ſaint Stiuens, and euery day pȝiuily ſpake with the Cardinall and ſo ſecretly he remayned till the.xxiiij. daye of Januarie, at which daye came into London, the Pȝeſident of Roan called Mounſire Bȝynion, as an Imbaſſadoȝ from Fraunces the french king, and was lodged with John Jokyn:

Myllayne yeelded to the French king

Mounſire Bȝynyon an Imbaſſadoȝ tȝō Fraunce.

Jokyn : this John Jokyn was kept priuie, because that no man shoulde knowe that there was any man of Fraunce, here to sollicite any cause for the French king, which after grewe to great trouble. For he shewed hymselfe to straungers, which fauored the french partie, and so at last it was openly knowne to the kings counsaile, and almost to all men : but when the Emperours Ambassador knewe thys darke dealyng, he mused not a little & sayde, that the Cardinall did driue priuie drifftes, and that by his meanes onely, John Jokyn was come into Englande, to entreat a peace in secret maner, or the kings friendes might know it, and all people sayde that John Jokyn was but a cast away of Jeane, and had no liuyng tolliue on, but of the Lady Regent, and marueyled why he should be kept close, and so much cherished of the Cardinall. For this keping close of thys Jokyn, Englishemen were rebuked at the Marte in Flaunders and Brabant. The Emperors Ambassador, and the Bishop of Romes Ambassador also sore murmured, why thys John Jokyn should be kept as a spirite in close, considering that there was open warre betwene the two kings, & feared that the kings counsaile should be corrupt. This John Jokyn was much with the Cardinal, but neuer was sene with the king nor his counsaile, but for al the secretnesse, Mounsire Pratt the Emperours Ambassadour knewe all the offers that he made for peace (which in deede were very great) and howe he had offered pencions to dyuers yong men about the king, of the which some were very glad, and so the noyse by reason of such offers ranne, that a peace was likely to ensue in short space.

The Cardinall did now grow in suspicion.

Mounsire Pratt wrote of this matter in all haste to the Emperour, in the which letters he highly commended the king of Englande for his stedfastnesse : but he saide some of the kinges counsayle loued neyther the Emperour nor the king of England, and wrote to him farther all the maner of the secret keping of John Jokyn. These letters at last were brought to the Cardinall, by what chaunce it was not openly knowne, and so he sent for Mounsire Pratt, and declared to him the matter, which answered him that he was counsaylour and Ambassadour to the Emperour, and that it was his part, to asserteyne the Emperour of euery thing, that was or might sounde preiudiciall to his maiestie, but howsoeuer that his aunswere was taken, he was not fauored with the Cardinall, but he sayde openly that it was not well ment to the Emperour to stop his packet with letters and to open them, and the Spanyardes sayde, that the Emperour sent them not into Englande to sleepe, but to doe him seruice. The Bishop of Romes Ambassador wrote to his maister, that peace was lykely to be concluded betweene Englande and Fraunce, and willed him to be the first friend to the French king, rather then the second. Of which writing came harme after, as you shall heare.

Mounsire Pratt the Emperors Ambassador.

In this Moneth tydings came to the king, how the Marques of Pilcaire in Italye, had gotten from the french king a Castell, called the Castell saint Angell, which was a great fortification of his siege at Paue.

There was in this Moneth a Flemyng in Heddyng Castell, which came oftentimes to saint Omers, and promised them if they would come to Heddyng, he would delyuer the Castell : vpon thys worde they of saint Omers gathered together seuen hundred footemen, and fiue hundred horsemen, and poynted wyth the spie, that the fourth daye of Februarie, they would would come thether, and when the falſe knaue knew the day, he told Mounſire Pontdormie Capitaine of Heddyng, which incontinent filled the caſtell with men of warre, and layde buſhements on euery ſide, and had layde the ordinaunce, all on the one ſyde of the Caſtell, that waye that the Flemings ſhould come. The men of warre of ſaint Omers were conueyed by their ſpie, miſtruſting nothing, to a poſterne which was little vſed, and when there were as many in, as the frenchmen thought ſufficient, they let fall the portcolis: Then Mounſire Pontdormie cried, ſlay, ſlay, then the Flemings wiſt that they were betrayed, and put themſelues to fight for their lyues, that ſeyng Mounſire Pontdormie, commaunded to fire the ordinaunce in ſuche haſte and furie, that the flame was ſo great and fierce, that it brent the ſayde Lorde Pontdormie, and.xxvij. of hys companions all Gentlemen, the trayne was ſo haſtily fired, that they had no leaſure to auoyde. In the fight ten of the Flemings were ſlayne, and thirtie kept themſelues ſo hardily together, that their lines were graunted them, and ſo was taken as priſoners, the remnant that entred, lept ouer the Caſtell wall, and ſo ſaued themſelues, and tolde newes to their horſemen, which were without, which heering the miſchaunce, returned toward ſaint Omers.

Treaſon at Heddyng Caſtell.

Sunday the fift day of Marche, were receyued into London, Mounſire de Beuer Lord of Camphere, Admyral of Flaunders, and the Preſident of Malines, called Maiſter John de la Coos, and Maiſter John de la Gache, as Ambaſſadours from the Lady Margaret, in the name of the Emperor, for cauſes of the low countryes, of Brabant, Flaunders, and Zeland: and on Tewesday they were brought to the king to Bridewell, which nobly them enterteyned, and then they ſhewed how the Emperors maieſty had commaunded them to obaye the king of England, as Protector and Gouernor, wherfore they and all theirs, were at hys commaundement, and if they had done otherwiſe, and not obayed him as their gouernor, they aſked him mercy, then the king and they talked together ſecretly, and then they departed. Theſe Ambaſſadoures demaunded three thinges.

Ambaſſadors of Flaūders.

1 Firſt, they demaunded the Lady Mary the kinges onely daughter, to be deliuered to them out of hande, and ſhe to be named Empriſe, and to take poſſeſſion of al the low countries, and to be gouernor of the ſame, this article was not agreed to, for cauſes.

Articles demaunded of king Henry in the behalfe of the Emperour.

2 Alſo that all ſuch ſommes of money, as the king ſhould geue with her in maryage for a dower to be made to her, ſhould be payed incontinent this article was alſo denied.

3 Thirdely, that the king of England himſelfe, ſhould paſſe the Sea and make warre in Fraunce, the next Sommer, to this the king ſayed he would take aduiſement.

Thurſday the .ix. day of March, at ſeauen of the clocke in the morning there came a Gentleman in poſte, from the Lady Margaret Gouerneſſe of Flaunders, and brought letters, ſhewyng how that the foure and twentie day of February, the ſiege of Pauia, where the French king had lien long, was rayſed by force of battayle, and the French king himſelfe taken priſoner, and how by the Duke of Burbon, the Viceroy of Naples called Myngnouale, and the Marques of Piſcaire, and other the Emperors Capitains the whole power of Fraunce was diſcomfited, and how the Duke of Albany with with seauen thousande men, was going to Naples, and how the Bysshop of Rome was become French against the Emperour, and had sent his Cosyn in ayde of the French king, wyth a great power. The same day the Presi-dent of Roan and John Jokin, were going to the courte (for they had not yet spoken with the king) and in Holborne in their way was tidings brought them, of the taking of the king their Maister, & of the losse of the field, which hering this misaduenture, returned to their lodging sorowfull, and within short space returned to the Regent of Fraunce. It was thought surely ỳ the king of England, would haue had peace with the French king, if this chaūce had not happened, for al the people of England, grudged against Flaunders, for their euill entreating, in the time of warre, & also the king was displeased with them, for enhaūsing his coine there, which was a cause that money was dayly conueied out of the realme, & many other causes there were of grudge.

The Bishop of Rome be-come French against the Emperor.

A triumph for the taking of the French king.

Saterday the. xj. day of Marche, in the Citie of London for these ty-dinges, were made great fiers and triumph, and the Maior and Aldermen road about the Citie with trumpettes, and much wyne was layed in diuers places of the Citie, that euery man myght drinke, and on Tower hill the Ambassadours of Rome, of Flaunders, and Uenice, had a great banquet made in a goodly tent, which pleased them well, and as they returned home-warde, all the streates were full of harnised men and Cressets, attending on the Constables, which they praysed much.

Sonday the. xij. of Marche, the king accompanied with the Ambassa-dors, of Rome, of the Emperor, of Scotland, & Uenice, of Millaine & Flo-rence, roade in his estate to Paules Church, and there the Cardinall sang Masse, & a. xj. Prelats waighted on him in pontificalles, & after Masse was done, the quere sang Te deum, & the Minstrels playd on euery side, & when all was done, the king returned to Bridewel, and there kept a solempne din-ner. The Bishop of Scotlande was much marked this day, for whensoeuer he came to the court before this time, his apparel was sūpteous, his whood was euer Ueluet or crimosin satin: but after the taking of the French king, he ware onely blacke chamlet, by which token men iudged his French hart.

From the. ix. day of Marche to the. xvj. day, the king had no mo letters, of the maner of battaile of Pauie, and that day he receyued a letter from the Duke of Burbon, by a Gentleman called Gropayne: when the king had redde the letter, he came into the Queenes chamber, and their the sayd Gro-paine declared the manner of the siege, and how well it was planted, and how the Emperors men entered the French campe by force, and threw downe their bastiles, and fought with the Frenchmen, within their campe, and tooke their king prisoner in the same, and many other which was mar-uell. For when the French king entred Italy, he had in his gard. xj. hundred men, and of speres furnished two thousand three hundred & fifty, and of light horsemen eyght hundred and. xx. and of footemen. lvij. thousand and of these the Duke of Albany had but eyght thousande so that there remayned with the French king nine and forty thousand, nine hundred and fifty men, wher-of was taken. xiiij. thousande and mo, beside the great riches, and the good-ly ordinance, which were twelue great Bombardes of brasse, and foure and twentie great Canon peeces. xviij. double Curtalles, foure double Canon peces, two middle Canon peces, and eight other peces. After the fielde was done, the French king was put in the custodie of the Uiceroy of Naples, which much comforted hym, and prayed his valiauntnesse, and prayed him to be content, for he should haue a gentle ende, then he desired to wright to his mother, which was to him graunted, the very wordes were these.

The frenche kings letter written to his mother when he was prisoner.

To aduertise you of my infortunate chaunce nothing is left but the honor, and the life that is saued, and because some other newes shall recomfort you, I haue desired to write to you this letter, the whych liberally hath bene graunted to me: beseching you to regarde the extremitie of your selfe, in ensuing your accustomed wisedome. For I hope that at the length God will not forget me, to you recommending your little infauntes and mine, supplying you to geue saufeconduite, to passe and returne from Spaine, to this berer that goeth toward the Emperor, to know in what wise I shall be intreated, and thus right humbly to your good grace, I haue me recommended: This subscrybed by your humble and obedient sonne Fraunces.

The Cardinall first began to suppresse Abbayes.

This season the Cardinall obteyned licence of the Bishop of Rome, to suppresse diuers Abbayes, to the entent to erect two Colleges, one at Oxford and another at Ipswich, and to endue them with the landes: which Colleges he began so sumptuously, and the scholers were so prowde, that euery person iudged, that the ende woulde not be good, as you shall heere, fiue yeres hereafter.

The Scots returned into Scotlande.

The Erle of Castelles which was sent into Scotlande, returned into England, the. xix. day of March, but because the French king was taken, his commission for the most part was determined, and so he and all his companie tooke their leaue of the king and without any rewarde returned into Scotland, the fourth day of Aprill.

Imbassadors sent to the Emperour.

In this moneth of Marche, the king sent Cutbert Tunstall Bishop of London, and sir Richard Wingfield, Chauncelor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and knight of the Garter, into Spaine to the Emperour, for great causes concernyng the takyng of the french king, and in especiall for warres to be made on Fraunce, on euery side. For so the king of England and his Counsaile were agreed and determined: and the same moneth the Imbassadors, departed againe into Flaunders.

Cõmissions.

The Counsaile remembring that it was determined, that the king in proper person should passe the sea, they considered that aboue all thinges, great treasure & plentie of money, must needes be had in a redinesse: wherefore by the Cardinall were deuised straunge Commissions, and sent in the end of March to euery shire, and Commissioners appoynted, which were the greatest men of euery shire: & there were priuie instructions sent to them, to say & order the people, & the tenor was, that the first part of euery mans substaunce, should without delay be payed in money or plate, to the king, for the furniture of his warre: wherefore the Cardinall, as chiefe Commissioner for London, sent for sir William Bayly knight, then Maior of the Citie, and the Aldermen, and diuers head Commoners, and sayd to them in maner folowyng. You the kinges welbeloued friendes and subiectes, of the Citie of London. I must declare to you, how the king contrary to his awne minde and will, but compelled of very force, is determined to enter into a new war, and for the more explanation of the truth, you shall vnderstande, that after that Fraunces the French king that now is, had obteyned the Crowne and sceptre of the realme of Fraunce, he most humbly sued to the king our mayster ster for peace, loue and amitie, promisyng vpon the Euangelistes to keepe the league then concluded, and also to pay to Lady Mary Queene dowager of Fraunce, her due pencion and dowar, to her graunted by king Lewys her husband. After this he by his Ambassadors, humblie desired the Citie of Tournay which king Lewys before tyme had loste: the king which woulde that the Citie of Tournay, should be no cause of grudge, betweene him and the French king, consented that for certaine summes of money, it should be deliuered. And farther the more to bind amitie betwene them, the king was content, that a communication of mariage shoulde bee had, betweene the Dolphyn of Fraunce, and the Ladie Marie, Princes of Englande, yet for to entreate more loue, familiaritie, and acquaintaunce, the king to his great cost and charge passed the sea, and met in person with the French king, thinkyng that by reason of personall sight and actuall communication, the more stable and firme loue, should growe betweene them, then by writyng at which tyme it was vndoubtedly thought, that there could no more loue be knit betwene two persons. There were couenauntes made and swore, and the king our maister sayde to the French king: Brother, now that you and I be thus knit, I require you to kepe firme peace, & amitie, with my nephew the Emperour: and also suffer not Duke John of Albany, to go into Scotland, for puttyng the yong king my nephew in ieopardie of his person, wherfore if you loue me, in especiall keepe these two articles: if you obserue these articles, and all other couenauntes betweene vs agreed, I assure you there had neuer Prince a surer friend, then you shall haue of me. Then the French king layde his hand in mine (sayd the Cardinall) and sware by the othe of a king, he would obserue and kepe firmely, these poyntes with many mo, and after the kings were departed, and that the Emperour was come to the king to Calice: the French king sent Mounsire de la Roche Baron with letters, declaring that he was in perfect league and amitie with the Emperour, and this notwithstandyng, he within lesse space then half a yere, sent Robert de la Marche to inuade the Emperors lande, and made warre in Nauerre, and other places. The king our maister heeryng this, of his meere charitie sent me, and other Nobles with a great traine to Calice, to knowe by whom the warre began, for he promised to be enemie to him that brake first. To which place came from the French king, his Chauncelor, and Mounsire de la Palice, and many other noble men. And from the Emperour came his Chaūcelor, and the Lord Cheuers, and there in open counsaile, the Emperors Ambassadors did shewe the French kinges letters, signed and sealed, by the which he enforced & began the warre: to which point the french Ambassadors could not answere. What should I say, the warre was open on both parties, I sent to the French king Ambassadors, to entreate peace, but in no wise he would consent: wherefore I with my company returned. In the meane season (although I doubted nothing, the French kinges fayth towarde our Mayster) yet for a more suretie I obtayned a safeconduit for the Englishe Marchauntes, that they should go to Burdeaux, and vpon suretie of that, our Marchauntes passed, yet he contrary to his safeconduit, tooke the Marchauntes goodes, and put their bodies in prison, which the Turke would not haue done. The king sent gently to him his Herault Clarenseux, desiryng him to redresse all these enormities, and to pay him his summes of money,

The othe of the French king.

due to him, and to the Queene his sister, for her dowar, which to do he refused and denied, which thinges you knowe, the king of his honour might not suffer. Wherefore mightily he hath these three yeres, kept warre continually both on land and sea, and inuaded Fraunce with two armies royall, and bet their townes, Castelles and fortresses, destroyed the people, and passed the water of Some, and profered battaile to the Frenchmen, in their awne Countrie, and hath brought the Countrie in such penury and wretchednesse, that in many yeres it will not be recouered.

And the more to hurt and dammage the French king, the king hath in wages the Duke of Burbon, which was the greatest strength on the french part: by whose power and ayde of other, which had great summes of money of the king our maister, the French king in person is now taken, and all his nobles in effect, before Pauia, and kept as prisoner to the Emperor and the king our maister, and that for great reason: for our maister sent sir Gregory de Cassado his Ambassador, to the Uiceroy of Naples, and to the Duke of Burbon, and the Marques Piscaire, with a hundred thousand Crownes, so that they would fight with the French king: For the which money they assented, and so gaue battaile, in the which they slue. xij. thousand men, & drowned seuen thousand, and. xiij. thousand taken prisoners, and now sith God hath geuen vs victorie, the king remembring the saying of the Poet that saieth: It is more maystry to vse victory gotten, then to get it, thinketh it necessary now in all hast, to make an army royall, and he in person to passe the seas, and to recouer his right inheritaunce, both of the Crowne of Fraunce as of Normandie, Guyen, Gascoyne, Iniow, and Maine, the writynges whereof comprehendyng the very title, you may see heere present if ye list, but I doubt not but you know them well ynough. And now I aske you this question, whether that you thinke it conuenient, that the king should passe with an armie or not, for the king will do by the aduise of his subiectes: to the which many sayde yea, yea.

The Cardinals demaũd of a subsidie.

Well sayd the Cardinall, then must he be made able to go like a Prince, which cannot be without your aydes, and for to shewe you what the Archbyshop of Cantorbury and I, which be primates of the realme haue done, we haue geuen of our landes, and all landes appertainyng to the Church, the thirde part, and the temporall Lordes, haue geuen of landes and goodes, the first part, and to ieopard their bodyes in paine and trauaile, and now sith they which shall aduenture theyr lyues, doth profer the first part, what should they geue which abide at home? Forsooth I thinke that halfe your substaunce were to little, not meanyng that the king so asketh. For he demaundeth only nomore of fiftie pound, the first part, and so vpon euery fiftie, aboue fiftye pound, to what summe soeuer it amount to, the first part, that is three shillings foure pence of the pound, and from. xx. pound, to fiftie pound, and so vpward two shillings and. viij. pence of the pound, & from. xx. pound to. xx. shillings. xij. pence of the pound, and thus to be leuied accordyng to the first valuation, as appereth by your awne valuation, which is but a small matter to the thing that is meant. Then they beyng astonyed, at last the one sayd, my Lord, sithe the last valuation, diuers Marchauntes be decayed, by the seas, and suretiship, and other wayes, so that valuation can not be had. Then aunswered the Cardinall, sirs, speake not to breake that thing that is concluded, for some shall not pay the tenth part, and some more, it were better that some should suffer indigence, then the king at this tyme should lacke, and therfore beware and resist not, nor ruffle not in this case, for it may fortune to cost some their heddes: But I will speake to the king to be good to you, so that if he go not ouer the sea in person, then you shall haue your money redelyuered, but first let the money be gathered, and lay it where you will, and if the king nede it not, you may take it againe.

The Cardinalles threatenings.

When the Cardinall had thus perswaded the Maior and his brethren and other head Cominers, they tooke their leaue, and euery day after by the space of a fortnight, he sent for a certayne number of Comyners, and tolde them lyke tale, but some spake suche wordes to him, and some goyng from him, that they were sent to warde.

The taxing of the Clergy

Nowe were Commissioners sent to the clergie, for the fourth part of their landes and moueables, and in euerye assembly the prestes answered, that they would pay nothing, except it were graunted by conuocation, otherwise not: for they said that neuer king of England did aske any mans goods but by an order of the lawe, and this commission is not by the order of the lawe: wherefore they sayde, that the Cardinall and all the doers thereof, were enemies to the king, and to the common wealth. Thys infamie was spoken in preachings, and euery where.

The grudge of the common people.

When thys matter was opened through Englande, how the great men toke it, it was marueyle, the poze cursed, the riche repugned, the light wits rayled, but in conclusion, all people cursed the Cardinall, and his coadherentes as subuersor of the lawes and libertie of England. For they sayde, if men should geue their goodes by a commission, then were it worse then the taxes of Fraunce, and so England should be bond and not free.

It happened in this time at Redyng in Barkeshire, that the commissioners sat for this money to be graunted, and the people in no wise would consent to the first part: but of their awne mere minde, for the loue they bare to the king, they graunted the twelth part, that is twentie pence of the pound, the commissioners hearing this, sayde they would send to the Cardinall, desiring him to be content with this offer, and so the Lorde Lisle wrote the letter, so that syr Richard Weston would beare it, the which letter at the request of the gentlemen of the Countrey, the sayde syr Richard tooke vpon him to carie, and roade to the Cardinall: which therewith was sore grieued, and sayde, but because that the Lorde Lisle wrote, that the matter was but communed of, and not concluded, it should cost the Lorde Lisle his head, and his landes should be solde to pay the king the values, that by him and you foolish commissiones he had lost, and all your lyues at the kings will: these wordes sore astonied syr Richard Weston, but he sayde little.

Sir Richard weston.

Then the Cardinall wrote letters to all commissioners of the realme that they should keepe their first instruction, and in no wise to swarue one iote, vpon paine of their lyues, and euery man to be valued, according to the valuation taken in the.xiiij. yere. This last poynt sore touched the Citie of London, for the Cardinall in the.xiiij. yere sent one Doctor Tunes his secret Chapelcine, to the Chapter house of Paules, promising to the Londoners, that whatsoeuer they valued themselues at, that no man should knowe it but the king, the Cardinall, and he, vpon which promise, many persons for their

more credite, and to be higher esteemed valued themselues at a greater substaunce then they were worth: thinking neuer to lend or pay by that confession, for the loane and the subsidie were payde, accordyng as men were sessed, and not by maister Tunes booke, when men valued themselues, not knowyng what should succeede.

Now in this time was that subtile valuation layd to their charge, which when they perceyued, they murmured muche and sayde, they woulde paye nothyng, except the kings lawes, vnder which they were borne, so determined it: But this notwithstanding, commissioners went out to euery shire, for the leuie of the sayde money, but for all that could be perswaded, sayde, lyed, and flattered, the demaunde could not be assented to, saying, that they that sent forth such commissioners were subuerters of the lawe, and worthy to be punished as Traytors. So that in all the realme were Billes set vp in all places: Some Billes sayde that the king had not payde that he borowed: Some sayde that the subsedie amounted treble, more then he had bestowed: other sayde whatsoeuer was graunted, no good came of it: and other sayde that the Cardinall sent all the money to Rome, thus was the muttering through all the realme, with curses and wepings, that pitty it was to behold. The muttering of the people.

During thys season that the commissioners sat, and that the Bishop of London, and other the kings Ambassadors were abidyng winde to sayle into Spaine to the Emperour (as you haue heard rehersed) Mounsire Pratt the Emperours Ambassadour, which was sore angrie for John Jokyns comming into Englande, as you haue hard before, departed priuely out of the realme of Englande, the.ix. day of Aprill, without speaking with the king or the Cardinall, and so much did by safeconduit, that he passed through Fraunce in poste, and came to the Emperour before the Ambassadours of England came thether, and whether it was by his report or otherwise, the accustomed fauor that the Emperour and his counsayle shewed to the Englishe men, began then to decay, and to shew themselues vnkinde to the Englishe nation without cause, as you shall hereafter perceyue.

In thys yere the kyng folowyng of his Hauke, lept ouer a diche beside Hychyn, with a polle and the polle brake, so that if one Edmond Moody, a footeman had not lept into the water and lift vp his head, which was fast in the clay, he had bene drowned: but God of his goodnesse preserued him. The ieopardie the king was in.

In the beginning of thys.xvij.yere, the commissioners in all shires sat, for the leuie of the first part of euery mannes goods, but the burden was so grieuous, that it was denied, and the commons in euerye place were so moued, that it was like to haue growen to a rebellion. When thys mischiefe was shewed to the king, he sayde that he neuer knew of that demaund, and therefore with great diligence, he sent his letters to the Citie of London, and to all other places, in the which the king gently wrote, that he woulde demaunde no somme certayne, but such as his louyng subiectes would graunt to him of their good mindes, towarde the maintenaunce of hys warres: wherefore the Cardinall, the twentie and fir day of Aprill, sent for the Maior of London, the Aldermen and counsayle of the same, with the most substanciall persons of the common counsayle, and when they were come to his place at Weſtminſter, he ſayde: the king our ſouereigne Lorde, moſt graciouſly conſidereth the great loue, zeale, and obedience, which you beare vnto hym, and where lyke louing ſubiectes, without any grudge or againe ſay, of your louing myndes you haue graunted the ſixt part, of all your goodes and ſubſtaunce, freely to be payde, according to the firſt baluation, the which louyng graunt and good minde, he ſo kindely accepted, that it was maruaile to ſee. But I my ſelfe doe conſider the great loſſes, and other charges that daylie hath, and doth to you growe, and that notwithſtandyng anye loſſe or charge that happeneth to you, yet you neuer withſtood nor againe ſayde, any of the kings demaunds or commiſſions, as it appereth now of late, of which doynges, I haue highly the king enformed, for the which he gaue you hartie thankes. Then I kneeled downe to his grace, ſhewyng him both your good myndes towarde him, and alſo the charges that you continually ſuſtaine, the which at my deſire and petition, was content to call in, and abrogate the ſame commiſſion, and where he by reaſon of your awne grauntes, might haue demaunded the ſayde ſomme as a verie debt, yet he is content to releaſe and pardon the ſame, and will nothing take of you, but of your beneuolence: wherefore take here wyth you the kinges letter, and let it be read to the commons, and I doubt not but you wyll gladly doe, as louyng ſubiectes ſhould doe.

The ſayyng of the Cardinall to the Londoners.

Here note, that if the Cardinall had not ſayde, that the king had releaſed and pardoned the firſt demaunde, the Citezens would haue aunſwered the Cardinall, that they neuer made no ſuch graunt, and for a ſuretie no more they did not: and ſo they held their peace, and departed toward London, ſore grudgyng at the lyyng of the Cardinall, and openly ſayyng that he was the verie cauſe, and occaſion of this demaunde, and would pluck the peoples hartes from the king.

The cõmon counſayle.

The. xxbiij. day of Apryll, in the common counſayle of the Citie, was read the kings letter, according to the effect aboue rehearſed, wherefore the Citezens ſent foure Aldermen, and twelue Cõminers to Hampton court to geue thankes to the Lord Cardinall, which for buſineſſe as was ſayde could not ſpeake with him, wherefore they returned not content. Then euery Alderman aſſembled hys warde, in their places accuſtomed, and gently moued them of a beneuolence to be graunted to the king, the which they openly denied, ſayyng: that they had payde ynough before, with many euill wordes.

The eyght day of May, the Cardinall agayne ſent for the Maior and his brethren, which ſhewed them what they had done: then ſayde the Cardinall, you haue no ſuch commiſſion to examine any man, I am your commiſſioner, I will examine you one by one my ſelfe, and then I ſhall knowe the good will that you beare to your prince, for I will aſke of you a beneuolence in his name. Then was it aunſwered to the Cardinall, by a counſayler of the Citie, that by the lawe there might no ſuch beneuolence be aſked, nor men ſo examined, for it was contrarie to the ſtatute made the firſt yere of Richard the thirde, alſo ſome perſons commyng before your grace, maye for feare graunt that, that all dayes of their lyfe they ſhall repent, and ſome to wynne your fauour, will graunt more then they be able to paye of their awne, and ſo runne in other mens debtes, ſo that by dreadfull gladneſſe, and fearefull boldneſſe, men ſhall not be maiſters of themſelues, but as men diſmaied maied, shall graunt that, that their wyfes and children shall sore rewe. The Cardinall heard this saiyng verie paciently, and answered: Sir I maruaile that you speake of Richard the thirde, which was an vsurper and a murtherer of his awne Nephewes: then of so euill a man, howe can the actes be good, make no such allegations, his actes be not honorable. And it please your grace sayde the counsayler, although he did euill, yet in his time were many good actes made, not by him onely, but by the consent of the body of the whole realme, which is the Parliament. Then Syr Wyllyam Bayly Lorde Maior kneeled downe and besought his grace, that sithe it was enacted by the common counsayle of London, that euery Alderman should sit in his awne warde, for a benevolence to be graunted, which he perceyued to be against the law, that the same act by the same cõmon counsaile, might be reuoked and no otherwise: well sayde the Cardinall I am content. But now will I enter into the kings commission: you Maior, and you maister Aldermen, what will you geue? my Lorde sayde the Maior, I praye you pardon me, for if I should enter into any graunt, it might fortune to cost me my life: your lyfe sayde the Cardinall, that is a maruaylous word, for your good will towarde the king, will the Citezens put you in ieopardie of your lyfe, that were straunge: For if they would that waye, then must the king come with strong power them to oppresse, wherefore speake no more suche words, and with that he studied a little and sayde: My Lorde Maior, let you and your Citezens, if you be grieued with any thing in this demaunde, humbly and after a good fashion come to me, and I shall so entreat you that you shall be content, and no displeasure arise, and so I praye you shewe your neighbors, and so the Maior for that day departed. The flattering of the Cardinall.

The Maior did wisely not to assent to graunte to anye thing, for although he and the Aldermen had assented, the common counsaile would neuer haue assented. So on the next morowe, it was declared to the common counsaile, that their act ỹ was made that euery Alderman should sit for a benevolence to be graunted, was against a statute lawe: wherevpon the saide act was annulled: and then was it declared, that euery man shoulde come to the Cardinall, and to graunt priuily what he would, with this saiyng the Citizens were sore grieued, then the Maior gently shewed them, how he durst warrant, that they should be entreated gently, and exhorted them to go thether when they were sent for, which saiyng nothinge pleased them: and then in a fury they would haue had Richard Gresham, and John Hewster Mercers, and Richard Gibson Sergeant at armes and merchant Taylor, banished out of the common counsaile, and so without aunswere made, what they would do, they departed home.

In the same season through all the realme, this demaunde was vtterly denied, so that the Commissioners could bring nothing to passe, and yet they assayed both by fayre wayes and foule: some spake faire and flattered, other spake cruell and threatened, and yet coulde not bring their purpose about. For in Kent the Lorde Cobham was Commissioner, and handeled men roughly, and by reason one John Skudder, aunswered him clubbishly, he sent him to the Tower of London: For which doyng the people muttered, and grudged against the Lord Cobham, and saide expressly, that they would pay no money, and then they began to accompt the loanes and subsidies graunted, so that they reckened the kings treasure innumerable, for they accompted that the king had taken of this realme, twenty fiftenes, sith the xviij. yeare of his reigne, and in this grudge, they euill entreated sir Thomas Bulleyn at Maidestone.

In Essex the people would not assemble before the Commissioners in no houses, but in open places: and in Huntingdon shire, diuers resisted the Commissioners to sit, which were apprehended, and sent to the Fleete.

Insurrection in Suffolke.

The Duke of Suffolke sat in Suffolke this season in like commission, and by gentle handeling he caused the riche Clothiers to assent, and graunt to geue the sixt part, and when they came home to their houses they called to them their Spinners, Carders, Fullers, Weuers, and other Artificers, which were wont to be set a worke, and haue their liuings by cloth making, and sayd, Sirs we be not able to set you a worke, our goodes be taken from vs, wherefore trust to your selues, and not to vs, for otherwise it will not be. Then began women to weepe, and yong folkes to crye, and men that had no worke, began to rage, and assemble themselues in companyes. The Duke of Suffolke heeryng of this, commaunded the Constables, that euery mans harnesse should be taken from them, but when that was knowen, then the rumor waxed more greater, and the people rayled openly on the Duke of Suffolke, and sir Robert Drurie, and threatned them with death, and the Cardinall also, and so of Lanam, Sudbery, Hadley, and other townes about, there rebelled foure thousand men, and put themselues in harnesse, and rang the belles alarme, and began to gather still more: then the Duke of Suffolke perceiuyng this, began to rayse men, but he coulde get but a small number, and they that came to him sayd, that they would defend him from all perilles, if he hurt not their neighbors, but agaynst their neighbours they would not fight: yet the Gentlemen that were with the Duke did so much, that all the bridges were broken, so that their assemble was somewhat letted.

The Duke of Norffolke pacifieth the Commons.

The Duke of Norffolke, high Treasurer and Admirall of Englande, heeryng of this, gathered a great power in Norffolke, and came toward the Commons, and of his noblenesse he sent to the Commons, to knowe their intent, which aunswered that they would liue and die in the kinges causes, and to the king to be obedient: When the Duke wist that, he came to them, and then all spake at once, so that he wist not what they ment. Then he asked who was their Capitaine, and bade that he should speake: then a well aged man of fiftie yeres and aboue, asked licence of the Duke to speake, which graunted with good will. My Lord sayd this man, whose name was Iohn Grene, sithe you aske who is our Capitaine, forsooth his name is Pouertie, for hee and his Cosyn Necessitie, hath brought vs to this doyng, for all these persons and many mo, which I would were not here, liue not of our selues, but all wee liue by the substantiall occupiers of this Countrie, and yet they geue vs so little wages for our workemanship, that scarcely wee be able to liue, and thus in penurie we passe the tyme, we, our wyues, and children, and if they by whome we liue, be brought in that case, that they of their little, can not helpe vs to earne our liuyng, then must we perish, and die miserably. I speake this my Lorde for that the clothmakers haue put all these people, and a farre greater number from worke, the husbandmen haue put away their seruantes, and geuen vp houshold, they say, the king asketh so much, that they bee

not able to doe as they haue done before this tyme, and then of neceſſitie muſt we die wretchedly: wherefore my Lorde, now accordyng to your wiſedome conſider our neceſſitie. The Duke was ſory to here their complaint, and well he knewe that it was true: then he ſayde, neighbors ſeuer your ſelues a ſonder, let euery man depart to his home, and chooſe foorth foure that ſhall aunſwere for the remnant, and on my honour, I will ſend to the king, and make humble interceſſion for your pardon, which I truſt to obteyne, ſo that you will depart, then all they aunſwered they woulde, and ſo they departed home.

At the two Dukes requeſtes, Commiſſioners of great auctho̅itie were ſent to them, then the Duke of Norffolke, and the Duke of Suffolke, came to Bery, and thether came many people of the Countrey, in their ſhirtes, and halters about their neckes, meekely deſyring pardon for their offences: the Dukes ſo wiſely handeled themſelues, that the Commons were appeaſed, and in eſpeciall one Mayſter Jermyn, tooke much paynes in ridyng and goyng, betweene the Lordes and Commons: then the demaund of money ceaſed in all the Realme, for well it was perceyued, that the Commons would none pay.

After this, the two Dukes came to London, and brought with them the chiefe Capitaynes of the rebellion, which were put in the Flete, and then the king came to Weſtminſter, to the Cardinals place: Wherevpon this matter, he aſſembled a great Counſaile, and openly he ſayde, that his minde was neuer, to aſke any thing of his Commons, which might ſound to his diſhonor, or to the breche of his lawes, wherefore he wou̅de knowe of whom it was long, that the Commiſſions were ſo straight, to demaunde the firt part of euery mans ſubſtaunce: the Cardinall excuſed himſelfe and ſayde, that when it was moued in counſell, how to make the king rich, the kinges Counſaile, and eſpecialy the Judges ſaied, he might lawfully demaunde any ſomme by Commiſſion, and that by the aſſent of the whole counſaile it was done, and tooke God to witneſſe, that he neuer maligned nor deſired the hinderaunce of the Commons, but like a true Counſaylour, deuiſed to enriche the king: And the ſpirituall men ſay, that it ſtandeth with Goddes lawe, for Joſeph cauſed the king of Egipt, to take the fift part of euery mannes goodes, but becauſe euery man layeth the burden from him, I am content to take it on me, & to endure the ſame and noiſe of the people, for my good will toward the king, and to the comfort of you my Lords, and other the kings Counſaylors, but the eternall God knoweth all. Well ſayd the king, ſome haue enformed me that my realme was neuer ſo riche, and that there ſhould neuer trouble haue ryſen of that demaund, and that men would pay at the firſt requeſt, but now I finde all contrary, then euery man helde his peace.

The king ſore moued.

The king was ſore moued, that his ſubiectes were thus ſtirred, and alſo he was enformed of the deniall, that the ſpirituall men had made, and of their ſaiyngs, wherefore he thought it touched his honour, that his counſail ſhould attempt, ſuch a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denyed both of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie, for although ſome graunted for feare, before the Commiſſioners, yet when they were departed, they denyed it againe. Then the king ſarde, I will no more of this trouble: Let letters be ſent to all ſhires, that this matter may no more be ſpoken of, I will pardon all them that that haue denied the demaund, openly or secretly: Then all the Lordes kneled downe, and hartily thanked the king. Then letters were sent to all commissioners to ceasse, with instructions howe to declare the kinges pardon. In which declaration was shewed, that the Cardinall neuer assented to the first demaunde, and in the instructions was comprehended, that the Lordes and the Judges, and other of the kinges Counsaile, deuised the same demaund, and that the Cardinall folowed the minde of the whole Counsaile, these two poyntes were contrary one to another, which were well marked. And farther the instructions were, that at the humble peticion, and supplication of the Cardinall, the sayde great summes, which were demaunded, by the kinges authoritie royall, were clerely pardoned and remitted, wherfore the Commissioners willed the people to pray for the Cardinall: but the people tooke all this for a mocke, and sayde God saue the king, for the Cardinall is knowen well ynough, the Commons woulde heere no prayse spoken of the Cardinall, they hated him so much.

The pardon of the great demaund.

The saying to the Maior of London.

The .xix. day of May the Cardinall sent for the Maior and his brethren and certaine commoners, and made the Maior to sit downe by him, and then declared, that where the king was determined, in proper person to passe the sea into Fraunce, for which cause he asked of the Cittzens of London, and his other subiectes, an ayde towarde his charges, to which request (he said) that the Londoners were at all times conformable, like louing subiectes, but sith the king considereth, the great fall of the French king, which is yet prisoner, and that dayly he hath sute made to him for peace, greatly to his honor and profite, for I trust that all his right and title, shalbe to him deliuered which thinge once agreed, I trust you shall haue peace, and therefore at my humble request, the king hath pardoned you, of all these sommes of money, that of you were demaunded: & if his grace had not passed the seas, although the money had bene gathered, suerly it should haue bene restored againe, and consequently the king thanketh you as hartely, as any Prince may thanke his subiectes: and forasmuch as peace, is not yet concluded, I counsaile you to shewe your selues, enemies to the Frenchmen, and to saie that you be the kynges, bodie and goodes at his will and pleasure, so that your louyng mindes towardes him, may to the Frenchmen appere, you wot well what I meane said the Cardinall.

The preatis frate of the Cardinall.

Then the Maior and his companye kneled downe and most hartely thanked the king and him, and so departed. The next daye all this was rehersed to the common counsaile, which humbly thanked the king for the pardon: but two thinges them sore displeased, one was that the Cardinall bad them saye, they were the kinges body and goodes, they sayd that they vsed no dissimulation, for they would not saye they were the kinges, but they thought and were the kings in dede, and not in saying: the second was, that the Cardinall excused himselfe, that he was ignorant of the first commission: For all they knewe and were present, when he himselfe made to them the first motion, and what soeuer was saide by the Recorder, in his excuse, was taken as a cloke for the raine, and a dissimulation or a mocke. for wisemen perceyued all the handelyng of the matter: after the king had pardoned euery offendor.

The

The .xxix. day of May the Lordes sat in the Starre chamber, and thether were brought one Deuereux a Gentleman of Huntingdon shire (which woulde not suffer the Cammissioners to sit, as you haue heard) and John Scudder of Kent, these two were brought from the Tower, bare footed in their shirtes through London, to the Starre chamber, and there the Cardinall shewed them theyr offences, with terrible wordes: and after that, he shewed the kinges mercy extended to them, and declared their pardon, and so they were deliuered.

The morow after beyng the .xxx. day, were the chiefe of the rebelles of Suffolke, brought to the Starre chamber barre, and there the kings counsaile learned, layde sore to them their offence, but the Cardinall declared for them the kinges pardon: then the kinges Attorney, asked suerties for their good aberyng, they answered that they could finde none, then saied the Cardinall I will be one, because you be my countrey men, and my Lord of Norfolke will be another, and so they were discharged, and had money to bring them home: Now here is an ende of this commission, but not an end of inward grudge and hatred, that the commons bare to the Cardinall, and to all those Gentlemen, that vehemently set foorth that Commission & demaund.

In this troubleous season, the vplandishe men of Germany, called the Bowres, rose in a great number, almost an hundreth thousand, and rebelled agaynst the Princes of Germany, of which a great number were slaine and destroyed. In insurrection in Germanie.

In Aprill last past, the Tyndall men, with the ayde of the Scottes, to the number of. viij. hundred, did dayly great robberyes in Englande. For to represse this nest of theeues were sent, sir Richard Bulmer, and sir Christopher Dacres, with a great company of Englishe men, and to them diuers men came, and submitted themselues, but the great theeues kept them in the Mountaynes of Cheuiot, and dayly skirmished with the Englishemen, and could not soone be taken: but after long lying abroade, they seuered, and many of them were taken.

You haue heard before how the Cardinall suppressed many monasteries, of the which one was called Beggam in Suffer, the which was verie commodious to the countrey: but so befell the cause, that a riotus company, disguised and vnknowne, with painted faces and visers, came to the same Monasterie, and brought with them the Chanons, and put them in their place againe, and promised them that whensoeuer they rang the Bell, that they would come with a great power and defend them. Thys doyng came to the eare of the kings counsayle, which caused the Chanons to be taken, and they confessed the Capitaynes, which were imprisoned, and sore punished. Riot at Beggam.

The Cardinall about this season, by his power Legantine, sent a Chapeleyne of his, called Doctor John Aleyn, a man of more learning then vertue, or good conscience, to visite all places religious: this priest road in his Gowne of Veluet, with a great trayne, & was receyued into euery house of religion with procession, as though the Legate had bene there, & tooke such great sommes for his visitation, that the religious sore were grieued, and murmured much against it, and in especial, for they were charged with great sommes of money to the king, and now this sodaine visitation or *Prædation, cleane shaued them. The common people spake much against this, and also also they sayde, that the Cardinall by visitations, making of Abbottes, probates of testaments, graunting of faculties, licenses, and other pollynges in his Courtes Legantines, had made his treasure egall with the kinges, and yet euery yere he sent great sommes to Rome: this was their communication euer against the Cardinall and his high authoritie, and the spirituall men most disdayned it.

Elizabeth Blunt the mother of the Duke of Richemond.

You shall understande, the king in his freshe youth was in the cheynes of loue, with a faire damosell called Elizabeth Blunt, daughter to Syr John Blunt knight, which damosell in synging, daunsing, and in all goodly pastimes, exceeded all other, by the which goodly pastimes, shee wanne the kings hart: and she againe shewed him such fauour, that by him she bare a goodly man childe, of beautie like to the father and mother. This child was well brought vp lyke a Princes childe, and when he was sir yere of age, the king made him knight, and called him Lorde Henrye Fitz Roy, and on Sunday beyng the. xviij. day of June, at the Manor or place of Bridewell, the sayde Lorde led by two Erles, was created Erle of Notyngham, and then he was brought back againe by the sayde two Erles: then the Dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke led him into the great chamber againe, and the king created him Duke of Richemond and Sommerset: and the same daye was the Lorde Henry Courteney Erle of Deuonshire, and Cosyn Germaine to the king, created Marques of Exceter, and the Lorde Henry Brandon, sonne to the Duke of Suffolke and the French Quene the kings sister, a childe of two yere olde, was created Erle of Lincolne, and syr Thomas Manners Lorde Roos, was created Erle of Rutlande, and syr Henry Cliffor de, was created Erle of Cumberland, and the Lorde Fitz Water syr Robert Radcliffe was created Viscount Fitz Water, and syr Thomas Bulleyne Treasorer of the kings housholde, was created Viscount Rochefor d, and at those creations were kept great feastes and disguisings.

The creation of the Duke of Richmond

The Cardinal reformeth the kinges housholde.

After this the Cardinall tooke vpon him as the kings chiefe counsayler, to see a reformation in the order of the kings housholde, wherein he made certaine ordynaunces. He also made all newe officers in the house of the Duke of Richemond, which was then newely begonne: Also at that tyme he ordeyned a counsayle, and stablished another household for the Ladie Marie, then beyng Princesse of the realme, so that all thing that was done, was done by him, and without his assent nothing was done: he toke so much vpon him, and made the king beleue that all thinges should be to his honor, and that he needed not to take any payne, so that to him was the charge of all things committed, at the which wise men becked, and light men laughed, thinking great foly in his highe presumption. And at this time, the sayde Cardinall gaue to the king the lease of the manor of Hampton Court, which he had of the lease of the Lorde of saint Jhonnes, and on which he had done great coste. Therefore the king of his gentle nature, licensed him to lie in his Manor of Richemond at his pleasure, and so he laye there at certaine times: but when the common people, and in especiall suche, as had beene king Henry the seuenthes seruauntes, sawe the Cardinall kepe house in the Manor royall of Richemond, which king Henry the seuenth so highly esteemed, it was a maruayle to heare how they grudged and said, see a Boochers Dogge lye in the Manor of Richemond: these with manye opprobrious

They called him Boochers Dogge because he was a Boochers sonne.

wordes were spoken agaynst the Cardinall, whose pride was so high that he nothing regarded, and yet was he hated of most men.

In this season the French kings mother Regent of Fraunce, and the three estates of the realme, assembled together, concerning the estate of their realme: First, they sent a solempne Imbassadour to the Emperour, with articles (as they thought reasonable) for the deliueraunce of the Frenche king, and also for a peace, they sent also a messenger to the king of Englande, for a safeconduit for an Imbassadour to be sent into England, for a treatie of peace, which to the messenger was graunted and deliuered.

Then came ouer as Imbassadour from Fraunce, John Jokyn nowe called Mounsire de Uaux, which as you haue hard in the last yere, was kept secret in Maister Larkes house, and when he came into Englande, he was welcommed of the Cardinall, and there betweene them were such communications, that at the sute of the sayde John Jokyn, a truce was concluded, from the .xiij. day of July for foztie dayes, betweene England and Fraunce, both on the sea and on the lande. Full well wist John Jokyn what he ment, when he desired peace for foztie dayes, for in that season the Picards might haue a quiet haruest to carie in their corne, which they should not haue, if the garrisons of Calice and Guysnes: and other within the Englishe pale, had nat bene restrayned from warre, and also the Fishermen of Deepe, Bulleyn and Trapoyt, had quyet fishyng, by this truce, for the Naule of England, was come home to harborough, thys truce grieued the men of warre on both parties, it was so sodaine that they wist not well what to doe.

A truce taken betwene Fraunce and England for foztie dayes.

When the Fleminges hard tell of truce, and that they were not comprehended in the same, they began to rayle and sayde, that the king of Englande had not done truely with them, to take a truce without their knowlege: the Englishe men aunswered, that they had no Imbassadour in Englande, and if that they had had any, they should haue bene made priuie, but the king would send them no worde of his affayres, if they would not sende to knowe, for he ought their maister, nor yet them no such seruise.

The French men in this season, enterprised to enter into Flaunders, by Newdike, but they were manfully defended by the Flemynges, and because the French men passed by the Englishe pale, and had nothing done to them, the Flemyngs were sore displeased with the English men of Calice.

In the latter ende of July came into Englande Mounsire Bryond, chiefe President of Roan, and was brought to the Cardinalles presence at the Manor of Richmond, and when hys commission was shewed, it was doubted whether the auctoritie were sufficient, because the king his mayster was prisoner in Spaine: but then he shewed auctoritie, geuen to the Ladie Regent, and certaine nobles of the realme of Fraunce, by the French king in open Parliament, before his goyng into Italy for all things that did or might concerue the realme during his absence. When the commission was thought reasonable, then was rehersed to the Frenchmen their doublenesse, their vnstedfastnesse, and how they had behaued themselues toward the king of Englande: then they aunswered, if we haue offended you, you haue vs punished, for you haue brent our townes, slayne our people, destroyed our Countrey, so that you haue brought the lowe parties to a long miserie without recouery, and therefore sithe we be the lesers for our offence, yet wee sue for peace, least we be more punished. After long consultation, they offered many offers: first to paye all such sommes of money as were due, both for the yerely tribute, and also for the Citie of Tournay, and the Frenche Queenes dower, and farther to recompence the king of Englande his expences done in the warres.

A truce concluded with Fraunce by the Ladie Margaret for fiue monthes.

During thys treatie, worde was brought to the king of England, that there was a truce sodainely concluded, betweene the realme of Fraunce and the Ladye Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, and gouernour of Flaunders and the low Countries, for the space of fiue Monthes, so that no entercourse should be betweene them for Marchaunts, but by safeconduit, and that thys Proclamation was proclaymed at saint Omers, the first daye of August, wherevpon the king was contented, that a peace should be taken from the xiiij. day of August, to the first day of December, which was proclaymed in London: and by this truce euery Englishe man without safeconduyt might passe into Fraunce, and they likewise into England. When thys truce was proclaymed, the people murmured and sayde, nowe hath the French men gotten their fishyng quietly, and if they had bene kept from that, they had bene vndone, and so with faire wordes they helpe themselues, which if we haue warre againe, shal hurt vs, for this herryng shal vittayle their townes the next yere. This the common people talked, but it was to no purpose.

Ambassadors into Denmarke

This yere the king sent Doctor Henry Standishe, Bishop of saint Asse and sir John Baker knight into the realme of Denmarke, to common and entreat with the nobles of the Country for the reduction of kyng Christiern, to his realme, crowne, and dignitie, but all that coulde be sayd or perswaded could not bryng the Danes to any reason, they hated him so for his great crueltie, and in especiall for the great tirany that he committed at Stokeholme in Swethen, where he desyred a great number of his nobles to a banket, and after the banket, strake of their heades. When the Ambassadors of Englande saw that they coulde not bring him in againe: they then began to require, that his sonne might haue the crowne and dominion, which neuer them offended, and was of progeny borne of Lady Isabell, sister to the Emperour Charles the fift which also made great labor and instance for the same: but the Danes aunswered they woulde none of his procreation, for they sayde, the sonne would folow the father, or else at the least he would reuenge his fathers wrong, and so with this aunswere they departed.

Peace concluded and proclaymed betweene the king of Englande and Fraunce.

So much did the Ambassadors of Fraunce, both by offers and entreaties, that the king of England and his counsaile, did condiscende to appease, and the more soner because they saw if warre should continue, money must be demaunded of the commons, which had leuer rebell then pay any more money, as you haue heard in the last yere. When peace was concluded then were proclimations of the same, sent to euery Citie and good towne, and the viij. day of September this peace was proclaymed solempnely with a trumpet through the Citie of London, the effect wherof was, that vpon humble suite and large profers, made by the Lady Regent of Fraunce, and the three estates of the same, a peace, league, and amitie, was concluded betweene both the kings of England and Fraunce, and their countries and subiectes, so that the subiectes of eyther realme may lawfully passe and repasse, into the others realme and dominions, to by and sell frankely and freely, wythout let or interruption, and that this league in no wise, was a breche of the league taken with the Emperor and the Lady Margaret, Gouernesse of Flaunders in no poynt, but that the sayd Emperor and Lady Margaret, and al other the kings old & auncient confederates and alies, were comprehended in the same, and for due restitucion to be made to the frenchmen, there was appointed the reuerend father Cutberd Bishop of London, & for restitution to be made to the Englishmen, was appoynted the chiefe President of Roan.

And on the. xj. day of September, was a truce concluded in Spaine, in a towne of Vale Dolito, betwene the Emperour and the French king, from that daye to the ende of December next ensuing, at which time the Emperor had not seene the French kyng, which was conueighed by sea out of Italy into Spaine, to a Castell called Madrill, and there remayned: and shortly after fell sore sicke, and was in great ieoperdy, for the which the Frenchmen cared litle, for they sayd that if he died, they should pay no raunsome, and then their realme should be quyet.

A truce proclaymed in Spaine betweene the Emperour and ye french king.

This peace betwene England and Fraunce, nothing pleased the Flemyngs, wherfore when they had dronke well, they spake largely, and bosted how they had vittayled the English armies, and found them cartes and cariages, and thought it not kindely done, to refuse them as olde frendes and make peace with olde enemies, but they did not consider what money the Englishmen left in their countrey, nor how the Frenchmen for dred of the Englishmen, would not inuade Flaunders, so that they liued quietly, all this they considered not.

In the same moneth this peace was proclaymed, in Paris, Lions, Roan and Amias: by this peace the king of England, should receyue at certaine daies. xx. hundred thousand Crownes, which then was foure hundred thousand pounde sterling, of the which one payment of fiftie thousand pounde was payed in hande. After this peace taken, all the men of warre, that were about the retinue of Calice, Hammes & Guysnes, were called home, and the shippes brought into the hauens, and many a Creker wist not how to liue.

The conclusion of the peace.

In the moneth of October were sent into Fraunce, Sir William Fitzwilliam Treasorer of the kings house, and Doctor Taylor, as Ambassadors from the king of England, and were receyued through Fraunce very honorably, and by long iourneys at the last, came to the Citie of Lions the. xxiij day of Nouember, where to them were presented, Wine, Fishe, Flesshe, and Ware, and they were visited with diuers noble men. And on the. xxvj. daye they were conueyed to the court by two Erles, and at the gate receyued with two Cardinals, and so brought to the Lady Regent, which with much honor them receyued, and then they delyuered the kinges letters, which she tooke in great reuerence, and so with her counsaile, departed into her priuie chamber, and there taried almost two houres, and then came out againe, to whome Doctor Taylor made an eloquent oration in Latin, of the commodities of peace, and declared that the king his Maister for very loue, and not for no dred nor nede did not condiscend to peace. To whom the Bishop of Besanson, Chauncellor to the Lady Regent made answere: And that done, the Ambassadors were feasted, and serued with men of great estate, and after that they were conueyed to their lodginges.

Ambassadors sent out of England into Fraunce.

And on Sonday next ensuing, the Ambassadors were conueyed to the Court, and from thence the Lady regent and all the Court, roade solempnly to the cathedrall Church of Lions, and there a Cardinall sang a solempne Masse, and after that Masse was done, the Lady Regent tooke the two Ambassadors, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left hand, and so went vp to the high Aulter, and there she layde her hand on the Canon and Crucifix of the Masse booke, and there sware to obserue, fulfil, and kepe all the articles and agreementes, concluded in the league and treaty of peace by her Commissioners. And when this was done, the Bishop of Bisanson made an eloquent sermon, taking for his antheme. Quis est homo qui vult vitã: diligit dies videre bonos, inquirere pacem, &c. In this sermon he much praysed the king of England, which assented to peace, & lauded the Cardinall whome he called the Legat of God, for counsailing him to peace: for now was Fraunce free, and all hostilitie seased, and when this sermon was done, Te deum was song, and then the trumptes blew, and all other instruments musicall, and then the Lady Regent, with all her traine returned to the palace, and there were the Ambassadours highlye feasted, and then Sir William Fitzwilliam tooke his leaue, and came shortely into Englande, leauing behinde hym Doctor Taylor, which taried there till the French king was deliuered.

When the articles of peace, were knowne to the Emperor and his counsaile, full well wist they that the king of England now would be friend to the French king, wherefore he and hys subiectes, shewed themselues more straunge and vnkinde to the Englishmen, then they had bene accustomed. Insomuch that the English Marchauntes, put vp a supplication to the Emperor, shewing him how their goodes were taken, by letters of Marke, their shippes restrayned, new impositions taken of them, and most of all they complayned, that by an act made in Spaine called Premetica which ordaineth that euery cloth, should be of a certaine number of threds, the clothes of Englande here could not be solde, to the great hinderaunce of the English Merchauntes: For the Clothiers of Englande know not the number appoynted by the statute, and when they make cloth, they know not to what countrie that cloth shalbe solde, of these thinges the English Marchauntes desired a redresse.

At a day appoynted the Englishmen had an aunswere deliuered them in writyng, conteinyng certaine articles. The first if any wronges be done vnto you, our iustice is open in euery place. The seconde, as touchyng letters of Marke, we will be aduised by our Counsaile. The third, as touching your shippes we freely graunt that you shall haue our friendship liberally, so that with your awne shippes and goodes, you may go at your pleasure, passyng or makyng abode. And as touchyng customes, or impositions of new: The accident may cause vs so to do, but that shall be in suspence. And finally as touchyng our Premetica, made by the Lordes of our counsaile, and by vs affirmed, we will not breake, but we will suffer to the entent that you English Marchauntes, may bring true and well made cloth, for the which you shall be the better welcome: this was the very aunswere that the English Marchauntes had, of the Emperour and his Counsaile.

The king kepeth a full house.

In this Winter was great death in London, wherefore the Terme was adiorned, and the king for to eschue the plague, kept his Christmasse at Eltham

Eltham with a ſmall number, for no man might come thether, but ſuch as were appoynted by name: this Chriſtmas in the kings houſe, was called the ſtill Chriſtmaſſe. But the Cardinall in this ſeaſon, lay at the Manor of Richmond, and there kept open houſholde, to Lordes, Ladyes, and all other that would come, with playes and diſguiſyng in moſt royall maner: which ſore grieued the people, and in eſpeciall the kinges ſeruauntes, to ſee him kepe an open Court, and the king a ſecret Court.

The Cardinall kepeth opē houſhold

The Cardinall came to Eltham the. viij. day of January, and taryed there till the .xxij. day. In which ſeaſon the Cardinall, and other of the kings counſaile, ſat for a direction to be taken in the kinges houſe, and firſt it was conſidered, that the great number of the yomen of ꝑ gard were very chargeable, and that there were many officers farre ſtriken in age: which had ſeruauntes in the Court, and ſo the king was ſerued with their ſeruauntes, and not with his awne ſeruauntes, which was thought not conuenient. Wherefore firſt the officers ſeruauntes, were put out of the Court, and many olde officers were put to liue in their Countries, but the king of his bountie enhaunſed their liuinges, for he that had three pound wages, had fiue pounde annuitie, without attendaunce, and he that had .xl. ſhillings, had foure pound, and ſo euery man after that rate, and yong men were put in their rowmes. Then was there .lxiiij. of the garde, which had .xij. pence the day checked, put out of that wages, and they had fiue pence a day vnchecked, and ſhould dwel in their Countries, and come not at the Court, till they were ſent for, except it were for ſuites: in the which the Cardinall promiſed them, to be their helper: Alas what ſorowe, and what lamentation was made, when all theſe perſons ſhould depart the Court. Some ſayde that poore ſeruauntes were vndone and muſt ſteale: Some ſaide that they were found of the reuerſions of the officers ſeruice, ſo that for them was nothing more ſet out at the dreſſer, and it was great charitie to finde them. Other ſayd that the yomen of the gard, which were put out, were nowe not able to finde themſelues and their horſe, to do the king ſeruice. Other ſayde, that nowe they would poll, and pill in their Countries, and oppreſſe the poore people, thus euery man had his ſaiyng.

The Cardinal reformeth the kinges houſholde.

At this ſeaſon the Cardinall made many ordinaunces, concernyng the kinges houſe, which be at this day called the ſtatutes of Eltham, the which ſome ſayde were more profitable then honourable.

This Moneth of January was peace concluded, betwene the realmes of England and Scotland, for three yeres, and fiue Monethes, of the which the Scottes were very glad, and eſpecially the borderers, for they were ſore hurt by this warre.

A peace made betweene England and Scotland.

All this yere was continuall ſuite made to the Emperor, and his Counſaile, by the Ladie Regent of Fraunce, and all the realme there, for the deliuerance of Fraunces the Frenche king, and after many communications which tooke none effect, was ſent into Spain of Ambaſſade, the noble Ladie Margaret, late Duches of Alanſon, ſiſter to the French king, with a great compaine of Nobles and honourable perſonages. The Emperour Charles met the ſayd Ladie in the Market place of the Citie of Toleto, and her right hartily welcomed, and after that the Duches and her compaine had refuſed to agree to certaine articles, which the French king had offered himſelfe, the sayde Duches had licence of the Emperor, to go to Madrill, where the frenche king was kept as prisoner, & there to know his minde. When she was there, she and other deuised such a way, that the French king should haue scaped, and post horses were layd euery where: this was not so secrete, but the Emperour was thereof enformed, and tooke certaine Frenchmen, which confessed how all thinges should haue beene brought to passe. The Duchesse of Alanson heeryng that her priuie deuise was opened, on post horses with all spede returned into Fraunce, leauyng the whole matter at large.

But for all this the Lordes of Fraunce ceassed not dayly to sue for the deliueraunce of theyr souereigne Lord, and at last to the Emperour was deliuered a booke for the French kings deliueraunce. For the Emperour sayde he woulde nothing demaunde of him, for hauyng him he had more then he could geue him. Then the French king and his Counsaile, offered a booke conteyning many articles to the Emperour: and when the Emperour had well vnderstand the contentes of the same, he sayde to the French Ambassadors, is this the full will and agreement of your Mayster, they aunswered yea: well sayde the Emperour, if this be his awne offer, I trust that he will kepe it. Then the Emperor thought best to bring the French king to more libertie and to visite him himselfe, which he had not done but in the tyme of his sickneſſe. Where the .xiiij. day of Februarye, the Emperour accompanied with the great Constable of Fraunce, the Duke of Enphantaso, the Duke of Ciuill, the Duke of Nallo, the Duke of Aluoy, the Duke of Arberkirke, the Duke of Medena, the Duke of Masſedonia, the Marques of Aguler, the Marques Villafranca, the Marques of Sturgus, the Erle of Barselona, the Erle of Bomuent, the Erle of Jeneuer, the Erle of Salenas, the Erle of Arrowsse, the Erle of Saluator, and .xij. Bishoppes, and a great number of Nobles, came to the Castle of Madrill, to whome was the Frenche king brought with a noble repayre, to whome the Emperor made low reuerence, and declared to him how all victories consist in the hande of God, and where great debate, warre, and strife, had long continued betweene them, he sayd it was the very handy worke of God, to deliuer him to captiuitie, so that by his restraint of liberty, a generall peace should be concluded through all christendome and now sith you haue offered vs reasonable condicions, we entending not your punishment, nor restraint of your liberty, haue gently receiued your offers, signed with your awne hande.

And soone after a peace was concluded betweene the Emperour and the French king, and the same openly proclaymed through all Spain, Fraunce, Flaunders, and the Emperours Dominions, whereof their subiectes were glad, and made fiers and triumphes through all their Countries. The king of England also shewed himselfe to be very glad of the said peace. Wherefore he heryng that the French king was at a poynt to be deliuered, sent a knight of his Chamber, called sir Thomas Cheyner to the French king, certefiyng him of the great gladnesse that he had of his deliuery, and also the comfort that he had for the conclusion of peace: of which kinde remembraunce, the French king much reioyced. The French king tooke his leaue of the Emperour, and tooke his iourney into Fraunce ward, and came to Victoria, in which season the same went, that the Dolphyn which should haue bene deliuered, as one of the hostages, for the French king his father was deceased, and ſo the French king was ſtayed for.xv. dayes, till the truth was knowne: other ſayd that the cauſe was that there were betwene Fountraby and Bayon. xxx. thouſande men, and doubted leaſt if he had bene brought downe to Fountraby, he might haue bene reſcued: but whatſoeuer the cauſe was, he was reſtrayned as you haue heard: but ſhortly after he was deliuered and returned into Fraunce the. xxj. day of March which was taken the. xxiij. day of Febzuary in the yere laſt paſt.

After that the Emperour had concluded, and taken his leaue of the French king, he rode to the fayze Citie of Ciuill, and there he with great triumph maryed Ladie Iſabell daughter to king Emanuell of Portyngale, with whom he had great treaſures and ſummes of money, and great friendſhip of the Portingales, for he had. xj. hundzed thouſand Ducates with her maryage. When this mariage was knowne in England, the Engliſhemen ſore murmured, that the Emperour beyng at Windſore, in the. xiiij. yere of the king, had faythfully promiſed to mary the Ladie Mary, daughter to the king of England. But for a very truth the Emperours Counſaile was not content with the aunſwere made to Mounſire de Beuers the laſt yere, and ſo counſayled the Emperor, not to tary for the Ladie Mary which was yong: and alſo they ſayd that ſhe was begotten of the king of England by his bzothers wife. And alſo an act was made in Spaine, that he ſhould not depart the Countrie, till he had iſſue. All theſe thinges were layd to him, which cauſed him to encline to mariage, and ſeyng the great offer that the king of Portingall made to him, he was thereto agreeyng, and ſo maried the Ladie Iſabell ſiſter to king John of Portingall.

The mariage of the Emperour.

The.xxviij. day of Apzill, in the beginning of this.xviij. yere, came to the Court to Grenewiche, Mounſire Bzenion chiefe Pzeſident of Roan, and John Johyn now called Mounſire de Vaux, which Pzeſident of Roan, before the king ſet in a Thzone, and accompanied with all his Nobles, and the Imbaſſadors of Rome, of the Emperour, of Uenice and Flozence beyng there pzeſent, made in the Latine tongue a ſolempne ozation, the effect wher-of was that he ſhewed, how dzeadfull the warres had beene betweene the realmes of Englande and Fraunce, what great loſſe the realme of Fraunce had ſuſteyned by the ſayde warres: He declared farther of what power the king of England was, and what conqueſt he might haue made in Fraunce, the king beyng priſoner, and knowledged the king of Englands right in the warres, & their wzongs, where he humbly thanked him of his pittie & cõpaſſion that he had on them in their neceſſitie & affliction, that he would conſent to peace. To this ozation the Chauncelour of the Duchie of Lancaſter, by name ſyz Thomas Moze made aunſwere ſaying: that it much reioyſed the king, that they firſt conſidered how by his power he might haue oppzeſſed, and how by his pittie he had releued them: wherefoze he would hereafter that for kindneſſe, they ſhould ſhewe him none vnkindneſſe, but inuiolatly to kepe that league which was concluded.

The anſwere of ſir Thomas Mooze to the Imbaſſadors ozation.

The next daye after beyng Sundaye, the Cardinall ſong a ſolempne Maſſe in the kinges Chapell of Grenewiche, and after Maſſe the king ſware before the Frenche Imbaſſadors, the foure Imbaſſadors aboue reherſed beyng pzeſent, that he ſhould keepe the peace and league concluded, betwene him and his bzother and perpetuall alie the French king, during his lyfe and a yeare after, and after Maſſe to all Ambaſſadours was made a great feaſt.

Becauſe all this Sommer the king tooke his paſtime in hunting, and nothing happened worthy to be written of: I will returne to the Frenche king, now come agayne into his realme.

The French king is returned into his realme.

When he was at Paris he ſayde and wrote to the Emperour, that he would obſerue and keepe his promiſes in euery point, but what he thought I will not iudge: For ſhortly after he ſet forth a booke, called the Apologie or defence agaynſt the conuention or agreement made betweene the Emperor and him at Madrill, alleaging that he was compelled to make that agrement, or elſe he ſhould neuer haue beene delyuered: He alleaged farther that the Lawyers of hys realme cleerely determined, all promiſes and couenauntes made by any perſons to his awne hurt, with him that is more of power then he, to be made by compulſion, & ſo of none effect and not to be performed. He alſo ſayde that the Gouernors of the lawe, determined that no othe or promiſe is of any effect, where a man is in ieoparde of lyfe, or of perpetuall impriſonment or bondage, and moſt in eſpeciall when it is done by compulſion or threatning. Moreouer he ſayde that he might geue awaye nothing apperteyning to his crowne, without the aſſent of his peeres, and the three eſtates of his realme (to the which he was ſworne at the time of his coronation, which would thereto in no wiſe aſſent, and therefore he ſaide that his othe and promiſe was voyde, and ſo he declared it to the Viceroy of Naples, beyng then with him as Ambaſſadour for the Emperour, and offred for his raunſome to paye as much money as euer French king payde, with diuers other articles of newe deuiſed.

The vntruth of the french king.

When theſe articles came to the Emperour, he them refuſed and ſayde, that he had deſyred nothyng impoſſible of the Frenche king, and if he might not, or would not kepe the appoyntment betweene them made, yet he bad him kepe that poynt of couenaunt, which onelye depended in his will, that was that he ſhould yelde himſelfe priſoner againe, and ſo he ſhould haue his children deliuered: and then he would reaſonably common with him of new articles of agreement, and as to the Appollogie ſet forth by the French king that his othe and promiſe was voyde, and made by compulſion and threatnyng, it was aunſwered by another booke called the Refutation or Ouercommyng of the Appollogie, of the conuention of Madrill. Which two workes were ſo eloquently ſet forth, with ſuch and ſo many perſwaſions and allegations, both on the one part and the other, that it woulde comber a wyſe man (except he were perfectly indifferent) to iudge to which part he ſhoulde moſt encline, and giue credence, therefore I leaue it at large.

The French kinges Appologie.

The Emperours Refutation.

After that the French king was deliuered, and the peace concluded, the Emperor was fully determined to paſſe the ſeas into Italy, and ſo to Rome, and there to be crowned Emperor, wherefore heeryng the Biſhop of Rome, called Pope Clement the ſeuenth, a man of great wit and vice, and of little vertue or learnyng: much doubted in himſelfe what dammage might come to him, if the Emperor had both Naples, Scicill, and the Duchie of Millaine, and alſo were crowned Emperor. Wherfore he ſent to the Venicians, and to the Florentines, and to Fraunces Sforce Duke of Millaine, which had committed treaſon agaynſt the Emperour, and was depriued by iudge-

ment of his name and dignitie, and the same geuen to the Duke of Burbon, but yet by power he kept much of the possession: and declared to them, by what puyssaunce the Emperor would come into Italy, and what great possessions he had there, at euery ende of Italy, so that if he were once crowned Emperour, he would looke to haue the seignyorie of all Italy: wherfore they consulted and debated for their owne suretie, howe to banishe hym and his all Italy by power: and as they were debatyng of this matter, they hard word how the French king was returned into Fraunce, and sought all wayes and meanes howe to breake with the Emperour. When they sawe so open an action offered to them, with all diligence they sent theyr seuerall Ambassadors, that is to say, the Pope twaine, the Duke of Venice called Andrew Gritty, one (which was his secretorie) and the Florentines one, and the Duke of Millaine one, these fiue Ambassadors came to the French king, and declared what ioye & gladnesse their maisters had of his safe returne into his realme, and then they shewed to him howe they by the Bishop of Romes exhortation had deuised a league, which should set a perpetuall peace betwene all princes Christen, and for the more expedicion, they had set forth and agreed vpon articles, for the whole league. When the French king sawe the articles it was as he would haue it, for he thought by the whole power of the Confederates, his children should be deliuered, and he yet againe once to haue a medlyng in Italy: Wherefore with great gladnesse and solemnitie, he entered into the league, and sware to kepe it, and gaue to the Ambassadors great rewardes.

When this League was thus concluded, it was sent to the king of Englande, which with great deliberation lyke a wise prince, consulted much with his counsayle of this waightie matter, and when all things were fully perceyued, he aunswered to the Ambassadors, that he thanked much the confederates of their good will, but he would not enter into the league, because he would be an indifferent entreator betweene both parties and a meane for a peace: and so he wrote to the Emperour, which hartily thanked him, and tooke it for great kindnesse: thys league was called the holy league of Clement. When the Bishop of Rome sawe that this league was concluded, because he would shewe that he and the confederates, had iust cause of warre agaynst the Emperor for things done in Italy, he sent to him a letter, dated at Rome the .xxiij. day of June: But for as much as this is no parliament to the storie of Englande to entreat of the affayres of Italy, I will for a while leaue the Pope and the Emperour, and agayne returne to our matters of Englande.

The holye league of Clement.

Thys sommer was great grudge agaynst Marchaunt straungers in London, in so much that if the matter had not bene well pacified, much businesse might haue folowed, the cause of the grudge was this, there was an act made in the fourth yere of king Henry, that no straunger should bring in no Wyne nor Woade in any aliens ship: so that the Englishe men after that went to Tholose, and brought much Woade to London, and serued all the clothiers repayring to London: and now in thys yere by meanes of gentlemen about the king, the straungers had license to bring in woade in straungers bottomes, so that all London was full of their woade, and also they sent their woade into the countrey, so that the Englishe mens woade in London lay vnbought: wherefore syr John Aleyn knight beyng Maior, sent for a great great sort of straungers which were the chiefe Marchaunts of all, and shewed vnto them what gaynes they had gotten in the Citie, by reason whereof they should auaunce the City, and not hurt it, wherfore he willed them to sell their woade to the Marchaunts of London, and they should be payde incontinent and not to resort to other places in the Countrey with their woade, to the hinderance of the Londoners. The straungers proudely aunswered the Maior, that they would seeke euery place for their auauntage, and so in mocking maner departed. The Maior perceyuing that, called a common counsayle in the Moneth of August, and there were many billes layde agaynst the straungers, and at last it was enacted, that no Citezen or free man, should buy or sell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certaine straungers, called Anthony Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthony Uiuald, Anthony Caueler, Fraunces de Bard, Thomas Calnecant, and a great sort mo whose names I let passe, and if any person did meddle or occupie wyth them contrarie to this act, he should leese his freedome and libertie in the Citie of London: by which act the straungers were so brideled, that they came to a reasonable poynt and conclusion.

The first inhaunsing of the Angell.

In thys season the angell Noble was iust the sixt part of an ounce Troy so that sixe Angels were iust an ounce, which was sortie shyllings sterling, and the Angell was worth two ounces of Siluer, so that sixe Angels were twelue ounces, which was but sortie shillings in Siluer: but in Flaunders, Brabande, and Zeland, the Angell was worth seuen shillings foure pence, so that Marchaunts daylie caried ouer much money to the great hinderaunce of the marchaundise of this realme, for most men caried Golde, and when it was there, it was losse in euery noble eyght pence to bring it hether againe: and when the Englishe men spake to the rulers there, to leaue the enhaunsing of the kings coyne, they laughed them to scorne. The king and his counsayle perceiued to what ende this enhauncement in Flaunders, if it were not met with shortly would bring the riches of thys realme: wherefore in the Moneth of September, he by proclamation, enhaunced the Angell to seuen shillings foure pence, and the Royall to a.xj.shillings, and the crowne to foure shillings & foure pence, and this proclamation was made through all Englande: and to bring out of Flaunders the great number of Englishe Golde which was there, the king by proclamation agayne the fift day of Nouember, enhaunced the Angell to seuen shillings sixe pence, and so euerye ounce of Golde should be.xlv.shillings, and that an ounce of Siluer should be three shillings nine pence in value.

The second inhaunsing.

Thys yere on Mighelmas euen, Thomas Hynde which was chosen Shirife before, was called to take his othe, but he made defaute, wherefore one Simon Rice was chosen which refused, then was one George Robinson Mercer chosen, which tooke his othe not to be able. The commons were in such a furie, that they sware that they would haue a Mercer. Maister Nicholas Lambert an Alderman and Grocer, which had a dispensation for the shriualtie for that yere, seyng this discorde, sayde to the commons, maisters although my time be not come, yet to appease your strife, if you will chose me I will take it, and so he was chosen with great thankes.

In this season a sodayne rumour beganne in Spaine, that the Emperour would haue warre with the king of Englande, whereof hearing the Englishe

Englishe Marchaunts, which lay in Spaine at diuers Portes, concluded to send to Doctor Edward Lee, Ambassador for the king of England in the Emperours Court to knowe the certeintie, which gently answered them, that he trusted that there was no such cause, of the which they should be afeard, for the king his maister and the Emperour were yet in perfite loue and amitie, and farther he sent them worde, that the king of Englande was not entered into the league of Italy with the confederates, as they would haue him, for he laboreth to make a vniuersall peace, which he could not conueniently doe, if he were protector or a contractor in the league, this answere he sent to them from Granado, the fift day of September.

The .xiij. day of January came to the Court, Don Hugo de Mendosa a great man borne in Spain of a noble famely, this person was sent as Ambassador from the Emperour to the king of Englande with large commission, for the Emperour put it to the king of Englandes determination, whether his demaundes which he required of the French king, were reasonable or not, and for the declaration thereof, and for to knowe the king of Englandes requeste and entreatie concerning the peace, was this Noble man sent into Englande, which manye times consulted with the king and hys counsayle, and he taried here two yeres full.

In this yere the second day of Marche were receiued into London, with a greate company of noble men, the Bishop of Tarbe, Fraunces Vicount of of Tornaye, and Maister Anthony Vesey, second president of Paris, as Ambassadors from the French king, and so brought through London to the Tailors hall and there lodged, and afterward were conueied to Greenewich to the king, where they were right hartely entertayned, and after their letters red and their requestes heard, they departed for a season to London

Ambassadors from the French king.

The French Ambassadors hauing their recourse to the king and his counsaile, much labored to haue in mariage the Lady Mary daughter to the king, and after long counsailing, that matter was put in suspence because the president of Paris, doubted whether the mariage betwene the king and her mother, beyng his brothers wife were good or no: of this first motion grew much businesse or it were ended, as you shall heare afterward. The common people repugned sore against that demaund, for they sayde that she was heire apparant to her father, and if he shoulde dye, they would haue no frenchman to be king of England, and thus the common people spake, as their mindes serued them.

Of this motion grew all the trouble betweene Queene Katheryn and king Henry her husband.

On the .xiiij. daye of March were conueyed from London to Greenewiche, by the Erle of Rutland and other, the Lorde Gabriell de Salamanka Erle of Ottonbrough, John Burgraue of Silnerberge, and John Faber a famous Clarke, after Bishop of Vien, as Ambassadors from Don Fernando, brother to the Emperor, newly elect king of Hungarye and Beame, after the death of his brother in law king Lewys, which was slaine by the Turke the last Sommer, as you haue heard before: this company was welcomed of the high Officers, and after brought into the kinges presence, all the nobilitie being present, and there after great reuerence made, the sayd Clarke Maister Faber made a notable oration, taking his grounde of the Gospell, Exiit seminare semen suum, and of that he declared how Christ and his disciples went forth to sowe, and howe that seede was good that fell into the good ground, ground, and brought forth good fruite, which was the Christian faith: and then he declared how contrary to that sowyng, Machomet had sowne seede, which brought foorth euell seede, and shewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increased in power, what realmes they had conquered, what people they had subdued euen to that day: he declared farther what actes the great Turke then liuing had done, and in especiall he noted the getting of Belgrade, and of the Rhodes, and the slaying of the king of Hungarye, to the great rebuke (as he saide) of all the kinges christened: he set forth also what power the Turke had, what diuersities of companies, what armure, what Capitaynes he had, so that he thought, that without a marueilous great number of people, he coulde not be ouerthrowne wherefore he moste humbly beseched the king, as saint Georges knight, & defendor of the fayth, to assist the king his Maister, to that godlye warre and verteous purpose. The answer To this oration the king by the mouth of Sir Thomas More aunswered, that much he lamented the losse that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the warres, which were betweene the two great Princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterprised that act, wherfore he with all his studye would take paine, first to set an vnitie and peace throughout all Christendom, and after that he doth with money and men, would be ready to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as any other Prince in Christendome. After this done the Ambassadors were well cherished, and diuers times resorted to the Courte, and had great chere and good rewardes, and so the thirde day of Maie next ensuing, they tooke their leaue and departed homewarde.

After that the Ambassadors of Fraunce were departed, the king sent an other Ambassade into Fraunce (that is to say) Sir Thomas Boleyn knight, Viscount of Rochefoorth, and sir Anthonie Browne knight, which came to Paris to the Bishop of Bathe, which lay in Fraunce as Ambassador for the king of England, and then these three went to the Court, and saw the french king in person sweare to kepe the league and amitie concluded betweene him and the king of England, and there they had great cheare and Maskes shewed vnto them, but litle rewards were geuen, and so the Viscount Rochforth returned into England, and so did the Bishop of Bathe shortly after, leauing sir Anthonie Browne behinde for a ligier.

In this moneth of May the tenth day, the king sent sir Frauncis Poynes knight, as Ambassador from the king of England, to Charles the Emperour, and with him he sent Clarenseaux, king at armes, to demaunde the one halfe of the treasure and ordinaunce which was taken at Pauia, for so much as that warre, was made as well at the kinges charge, as the Emperours charge: he demaunded also the Duke of Orliaunce, to be deliuered to him, and also it was demaunded that the Emperor should deliuer the Bishop of Rome which was taken this Moneth as you shall heere, and also should bring his armie out of Italy, & if he refused to do any of these pointes, then Clarenseaux in the kinges name of Englande shoulde make to hym defiaunce.

When it was knowen that warre was like to be had betweene the Emperour and the king of England, the Commons of England sore lamented the chaunce, for all Marchaundice were restrayned to passe into any of the Empe-

Emperours Dominions, and the Marchants were desyred by the Cardinal to kepe their martes at Calice, to the which in no wyse they would assent.

This same moneth the king sent two fayre shippes, well manned and victayled, hauyng in them diuers cunnyng men, to seeke straunge Regions: and so forth they set out of the Thamys the .xx. day of May, if they sped well you shall heere at their returne. Shyps sent to seke straūge Regions.

The .xvij. day of May came in post to the king out of Fraunce, the Bishop of Tarbie, this Bishop brought to the king of Englande, the Articles which the French king now offered to the Emperour, which were contrary to the articles swoorne at Madrill in the .xvij. yere of the king, and farther he moued the king of England to be enemie to the Emperor, which request (as all men say) was much furthered by the Cardinall, because of the warres in Italy, betweene the Pope and the Emperour: this Bishop made short tarying with the king, for in post againe he returned to Paris, to sir Fraunces Poynes, and Clarenceaux, which taryed there for him, and so they all tooke their iournay towarde Spaine.

And soone after, there were letters brought to the king of Englande from the Frenche king, of his affayres in Italy: but Sundaye the second day of June, the king receyued letters at the Castell of Wynsore, by the which he perceyued all the order and maner of the sackyng of Rome, and takyng of the Pope: Wherefore the king was sory, and so were many Prelates: but the Commonaltie little mourned for it, and sayde that the Pope was a Ruffian, and was not meete for the rowme: wherefore they sayde that he began the mischiefe, and so he was well serued. But the Cardinall which tooke this matter highly, called to him the Prelates, and the Clergie, and much mourned the fall of the Bishop of Rome, & saw how the people grudged agaynst the Spiritualtie, for their great pride, pompe, and all lyuyng: Wherefore he came to the king, and sayde: Sir by the onely callyng of God you be made defender of the Christian fayth, nowe consider in what state the Church of Christ now standeth: See, howe the heade of the Church of Rome is in captiuitie: See, how the holy fathers be brought into thraldom, and be without comfort: nowe shewe your selfe an ayde, and a defender of the Church, and God shall rewarde you.

The king aunswered, my Lorde, I more lament this euill chaunce, then my tongue can tell, but where you say that I am defender of the fayth, I assure you, that this warre betwene the Emperor and the Pope is not for the fayth, but for temporall possessions and dominions, and now sith Bishop Clement is taken by men of warre, what should I doe? my person nor my people cannot him rescue, but if my treasure may helpe him, take that which to you seemeth most conuenient: for the which offer the Cardinall thanked the king on his knee, and therepon the Cardinall caused to be gathered together of the kinges treasure .xij. score thousand pound, which he caryed ouer the sea with him, as you shall heere after. The kinges aunswere. The Cardinall hath of the king to relieue the Pope twelue score thousand pound.

Then the Cardinall sent Commissions, as Legate to all Bishops, commaundyng that they should cause in euery parishe Church, solempne Processions to be made for the relieuyng of the Pope, and moued the people to fast three dayes in the weeke, but few men fasted, for the Priestes sayd, that their commaundement was, to exhort the lay people to fast, and not to fast themselues:

themselues: and the laye people sayde, that the Priestes shoulde first fast, because the very cause of the fastyng, was for a Priest, but none of both almost fasted.

Longland bishop of Lincolne findeth fault with the kings mariage.

This season began a fame in London, that the kinges confessor, beyng Bishop of Lincolne, called Doctor Longland, and diuers other great Clarkes had tolde the king that the mariage betwene him and the Ladie Katheryn, late wyfe to his brother, Prince Arthure, was not good, but dammable, and the king herevpon shoulde mary, the Duches of Alanson, sister to the French king, at the towne of Calice this Sommer, and the Viscount Rochforth had brought with him the picture of the sayde Ladie, and that at his returne out of Fraunce, the Cardinall should passe the Sea to go into Fraūce to fetche her.

This rumor sprang so much, that the king sent for sir Thomas Seymer Maior of London, and straightly charged him to see that the people should cease of this communication, vpon paine of the kinges high displeasure.

But whatsoeuer the Commons talked, it was concluded by the king & his Counsaile, that the Cardinall should passe into Fraunce, as his high Ambassador, but for what cause no person knewe but the king, till his returne.

Then was much preparation made at Calice, for the receiuyng of the Cardinall, but the common saiyng was that the king would come to Calice, and meete with the Frenche king, and for that cause such preparation was made, but he came not there at al, and alwayes the people commoned as they durst of the kinges mariage.

The Cardinal rideth towarde Fraunce.

The third day of July, the Cardinall of Yorke, passed through the Citye of London, accompanied with many Lordes, and Gentlemen, to the number of twelue hundreth horse, towarde the Sea syde, and at Cauntorburie hee rested, and there to the people declared the destruction of Rome, and howe the Pope was in captiuitie with many Cardinalles: wherefore he caused a Letanie to be song by the Monkes of Christes Church, after this maner.

A new found Letanie.

S. Maria, ora pro Clemente Papa. S. Petri, ora pro Clemente Papa. and so forth all the Letanie: then he exhorted the people to fast and pray for his deliueraunce, which fewe did.

The .xj. day of May, the Cardinall with all his traine, tooke shipping at Douer, and the same day landed at Calice, where he was receyued with Procession, and with the whole garrison of the towne.

Barelles of Golde.

When the Cardinall was landed, there were set on lande .xbj. Barrels al full of Gold of the kings money, which were deliuered to the Capitain of the Castell in charge: of this money the people much grudged, and said this money shall be spent out of the realme, and yet Englishe men shall haue no part nor profite of it, but onely it shall be spent for the Cardinalles pleasure, and the French kinges, and the Popes profite.

The Cardinall was so sore displeased with the Emperour for kepyng the Pope in prison (although it were against his will and knowlege) that he imagined all the wayes and meanes possible, howe to hurt and domage the Emperour, and therefore he sent for the Englishe Marchauntes, willyng them to kepe the Mart at Calice, but they answered that the towne of Calice, was a towne of warre, and all Marchauntes must haue libertie at all houres of the night, in the Mart season, which they could not haue at Calice:

also the hauen is not able to receyue great Hulkes, and Carickes that come to a Mart: but some Marchauntes to please the Cardinall, brought theyr clothes to Calice, and so caused their friendes of Andwarpe to come to Calice, and to say, that they had bought the Marchauntes clothes, and there at Calice payed the custome, and so caryed them to the towne of Andwarpe at the Englishe mennes charge, and there solde them to the great losse of the Englishemen.

The Marte to be kept at Calice.

While the Cardinall lay in Calice, the Frenchmen dayly resorted to Calice, to welcome the Cardinall, and sodainly there vpon a noyse sprang that Calice should be deliuered, to the French King, which vaine saying, made many men muse.

But the .xxij. day of July, the Cardinall departed out of Calice, and with him was the Lorde Cutberd Tunstall bishop of London, the Lord Sandes, Chamberlain to the king, the Erle of Darbie, sir Henry Guldford, sir Thomas Moore, with many knightes and squires, to the number of .xij. hundred horse & in the cariages .lxxx. Wagons, and .lx. Moyles and sumpter horses, and at Sandifield met with him the Countie Brian gouernor of Picardie, and Mounsire de Bees, Capitaine of Bulleyn, with foure hundred men of armes, well apparayled, with Banners displayed, & all well horsed, which with trompets and melodie receyued the Cardinall, and at Marguison there met him the Cardinall of Lorayn, and sixe Bishoppes, and .xl. Gentlemen, well furnished, and in their companie foure hundred horse, and so they roade forth to Bulleyn, where the Burges them receyued.

The receauing of the Cardinall to Bulleyne.

And at the gate was made a Pagiaunt, in the which was a Nonne called holy Church, and three Spanyards, and three Almaynes had her violated, and a Cardinall her rescued, and set her vp of newe againe.

Another Pagiaunt, was a Cardinall geuyng a Pax to the king of England & the French king, in token of peace, in another Pageant was the Pope, lyng vnder, and the Emperour sittyng in his Maiestie, and a Cardinall pulled downe the Emperour, and set vp the Pope.

When wise men saw this Pagiaunt, they smyled and sayd, well can the French king flatter, for hard it were for one Cardinall to subdue him that hath pulled downe the Master of all Cardinalles.

Many words were spoken in reproufe of this Pagiaunt, but still with great triumph roade these two Cardinalles together, to the Abbey vnder a Canapie borne ouer them, and there lodged.

The morow being the three and twentie day he with all his trayne remoued toward Muttrell, and two mile without the towne there met with him the Baylifes, and there to him was made a solempne Oration, and when he came to the towne he was receyued with the Clergy, and there the Englishe men had strait lodging the number was so great, and so the morowe he remooued towarde Abbeuile where he was of the Baylefe and aduocates of the towne, and then of the garison of men of warre of the towne, receyued with procession, and Pagiants to his praise vnder a Canape, and so brought to the Church, and after to his lodging, and all the Canapies were set with T C for Thomas Cardinall, and so were all his seruauntes coates.

The thyrde day of August in the Citie of Amias, came the French king in a coate of blacke Uelu̇et vpon white Satin, and tyed with laces agiated wyth golde, and with him the king of Nauer, and the Cardinall of Burbon, the great Maister, the Duke of Uandosme, Monsier de Guise, and Monsire Uaudemount his brother, and the French kinges mother, with manye Lordes and Ladies, which were there solempnly receyued.

And on Sonday the fourth day of August, the Cardinal came fro Pickqueny towarde Amias, in which towne he lay the night before, and in the way he was receyued with the prouost of the Citie, and many honorable personages of the Citie, and after them came the Justices and Aduocates and with an eloquent Oration saluted him, and when he was within halfe a mile of the towne, the French king himselfe with all his nobles mette with him, and louingly embraced him, and welcommed him, and after tooke all the nobles of Englande by the hande, and so brought the sayde Cardinal to Ampas: where for him were deuised many Pagiauntes, to his prayse, and euer he was called Cardinalis Pacificus, the peaceable Cardinall, and so was written at the gate of his lodging.

The French king brought the Cardinall to his lodging, and he would haue brought the king to his Courte againe, but he woulde in no wise suffer him, but left him in his lodging, and the same night the Cardinall road to visite the French kinges mother, and there he had long communication and so departed to his lodging.

The fift day of August, the Cardinal with the great estates of Fraunce was conueyed to the Frenche kinges Courte, where he was of the French king most honorably receyued, which Courte was then kept at Amyas, and there remayned more then three weekes dayly conferring with the French kinges counsayle, and at the last with great solempnitie a Charter of peace was sealed by the French king, and delyuered to the Cardinall.

Now will I returne to sir Fraunces Poynes, and Clarenceaux which were at this time arriued in Spaine, in the towne of Vale Dolise, the third day of July, where they found Doctor Lee the kinges Almoner, there Ambassador for the king of England, and with him taried til the sixt day of July, and then sir Fraunces Poynes was brought to his presence, & deliuered the kynge his Maisters letter, and beside that prayed his Maiestie to consider what the king of England had done for him since his tender age, how that he holpe him at all times with money & treasure, & how that at such time as the Lords of Spaine would not receyue him as their king during his mothers life, yet by the kings meane & his great labor and cost, he was to that realme receiued: And also how the king of Englande had alwayes defended and protected the countries of Flaunders, Brabant and Zeland, against all persons, and in the quarell of the Emperor he had strongly inuaded the realme of Fraunce, so that by his inuasion at home, the Emperor had obtained great victorie in forreine places, which he coulde not haue done, if all the whole realme of Fraunce had bene without any enemies at home: wherefore the king desired him as reason would, the one halfe of the battayle of Pauie and also for his part he required the Duke of Orleaunce to be deliuered to him, and also to pay to the king fortie thousand pounde, which he ought to him as money lent, towardes his charges: and farther that he shoulde deliuer the Pope, and make him a reasonable amendes, and no farther to make warre

on hun or his dominions. The Emperor after this demaunde aunswered, sir we assure you that the loue of our Uncle of England, toward vs and the manifold benefits that we haue receyued of hym and by his meanes we shall neuer forget, and although our power be not able to recompence the same, yet oure good wyll shall neuer fayle, to endeuour vs to doe hym pleasure: and as concernyng his letters we with our counsaile shall take aduice, and we trust you shall haue a reasonable aunswere, during which time, you may repose you, and all thinges necessarie shall be at your commaundement: with this aunswere syr Fraunces departed at this time. When it was knowne in Spayne, that the king of Englande, was alied with the Frenche king, the Spaniardes spake largely and sayde that they cared not for the king of Englande, and sayde farther that all this was the drift of the Cardinall by reason whereof the Englishe Marchauntes were euill entreated in Spayne, but the Emperor perceyuing this, gaue a generall commaundement, that all Englishmen shoulde be ordered and reputed as his louing friendes.

The Emperors answere

In this very Moneth tydings was brought to the Emperour, how the inhabitaunts of Turnay conspired to destroy Mounsire Delanoies their Capitaine, and deuised to bid him to a banket, and so to slay him and all that loued the Emperour, but as God would, he had knowlege of this treason, and tooke the chiefe Capitaynes, and did on them sharpe execution, for feare whereof many fled into Fraunce.

The Emperour within a day or twayne called to him Doctor Lee, and Syr Fraunces Poynes the king of Englands Ambassadors, and sayde, my Lords, we haue perceyued the king your maisters requests, which be great and of a waightie importaunce, wherfore we entend with all speede to write to the king our Uncle, and when we haue receyued aunswere from him, we shall delyuer you of such things as you demaunde, praying you in the meane season to take pacience, and so for the time they departed.

By thys time was it knowne that the Cardinall of England was with the French king, and full well knew the Emperour that the Cardinall would doe all for to ayde the French king, and to domage him, yet had he a great pencion of the Emperour.

The Cardinall laboreth to helpe the French king agaynst the Emperour.

The Englishe Marchauntes fearing the sequele of this matter, conueyed away their goodes daylie out of the Emperours dominions: but still the Englishe Ambassadours came to the Emperous Court, and one day the Emperour sayde to them, my Lordes, I maruayle how the king mine Uncle is moued against mee and my subiectes, I assure you I will not warre with him, I trust in his faithfull promise, and his accustomed goodnesse, and his people I take as my friendes. If he loue the French king I may not so doe, for he to me is vntrue and keepeth no iust promise, and we neuer compelled him to make any offer, but his offer was of his awne motion, and he also swore to maintaine the same, which he now refuseth, and to our great preiudice hath perswaded against vs our dere vncle of England by peruers imaginations, which I trust will neuer be our enemy. Thys many times the Emperour would common with the Englishe Ambassadors, which lay in Spaine.

But nowe must I returne to the Cardinall of Englande which laye at

Ampas, there was a great counſayling from day to daye: Firſt howe the Pope ſhould be delyuered, and the ſea of Rome brought to a quietneſſe: ſecondarily how to bring the Emperour to ſome reaſonable agrement, ſo that the French kings children might be deliuered. It was well conſidered that the Emperour had a great foredell by reaſon of the ſayde two hoſtages, which fordele might perchaunce ſo ſtomack him, that he would agree to no newe conditions nor agreements. Then it was aunſwered on the other ſide that if a great armie were ſent into Italy which might driue the Emperors power out of Italy, then that armie ſhould ſet the Pope at libertie, and alſo driue the Emperour to come to their purpoſe, or elſe he ſhould leeſe both the realmes of Naples and Scicile, and the Duchie of Millayne and other dominions, wherefore the French king determined to ſend an armie royall into Italy vnder the conduyt of Mounſire Odyt de Lawtrick Erle of Foys, which was appointed afore in June to go to the borders of Italy with a ſmall number, but nowe to him was aſſigned eyght thouſand Britons with notable Capitaines of the ſame countrie, and eight thouſand Normans with like Capitaynes, and eyght thouſand Gaſcoynes, and ſixe thouſand Burgonions, three thouſand Sauoſyns, eyght thouſand Swychers and Almaines, and ſixe thouſand Pycardes of which men were fiue thouſand horſemen vnder the conduit of Mounſire Galyos, and in this armie went Syr Robert Iernyngham and John Carew of Hakam, and. lxxx. other Engliſhe gentlemen, which were ſent thether by the Cardinall from Ampas. When thys armie was aſſembled, the Cardinall deliuered the king of Englands money that he had brought out of Englande in barrels as you haue heard, with which money was this armie payde two Monethes before hande, and the remnaunt was delyuered to Sir Robert Iernyngham, which was called Treaſorer of the warres. In this armie were three thouſand cariage men, and aduenturers foure thouſande, ſo that when they were ouer the Mountaynes, they were, lix. thouſand men, and ſome writers ſay a hundred thouſand. This armie was called in Latin Excercitus Angliæ & Gallorum Regum, pro Pontifico Romano liberando congregatus, that is to ſay, the army of the kings of Englande and Fraunce, gathered for the deliueraunce of the Biſhop of Rome, and ſo was thys armie reputed. Although fewe people knewe at the beginning in Englande of the conueying of the money ouer the ſea, yet when the Engliſh coyne was the common payment of the army it was then openly knowen: then many men ſayde alas, ſo much money ſpent out of the realme, and of thys charge the realme ſhall not be one peny the better, the king hath had of vs a loane and that is not payde, and the great ſubſedie was graunted to make the king riche, and now is that money to help our olde enemies and the Pope, which neuer ſhall doe vs good, this the people ſpake and much worſe. Whyle the Cardinall was with the Frenche king, the Pope ſent to him a Bull, and made hym Vicar generall vnder him through all the king of Englandes dominions, and there by a Bull he created Anthony de Prato Biſhop of Sens and Chaunceloz to the French king a Cardinall with great ſolempnitie. The Cardinall for hys ſolace roade wyth the French kyng to Compeigne and Mountdedier, and was euer highly feaſted of the king and his mother, and of the Chaunceller of Fraunce, and of all the nobilitie. Then was it concluded by the Cardinall and the French kings counſayle what articles

ticles of offer should be sent to the Emperor, which if he refused, then open defiaunce to be made to him in the name of both the kings.

The Cardinal toke his leaue of the French king & his mother (which tolde him that a noble Ambassade should be shortly sent again into England from the realme of Fraunce for forteffying of all the conclusions) and so the sayde Cardynall with great rewardes returned with all hys traine, and by iourneys the last day of September he came to Rychemond to the king of Englande, and there asserteyned the king of all hys doyngs, but so could no Lord that then was in commission with him, for they knewe nothing of all his doyngs, which sore grieued their stomackes. The returne of the Cardinall into England.

The Cardinall which much reioyced in this peace, came the first day of the Terme into the starre chamber, and there by his commaundement were present the Lordes spirituall and temporall of the kings counsayle, and the Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London, and the Iudges of the lawe, and all the Iustices of peace of all shyres then beyng at Westminster. And then he sayde, how muche is the realme of Englande bounde to God for the high peace that now is concluded? A high peace, yea suche a peace as was neuer concluded betweene no realme, for by my labor and industrie I haue knit the realmes of Englande and Fraunce in such a perfite knot that it shall neuer fayle, for the three estates of Fraũce (which here we call a Parliamẽt) haue affirmed the same, & therfore now my lords be mery, for ỹ king shall neuermore charge you with warres in Frauuce, nor the Maior & other Marchaunts shal neuer be charged farther with expences, so that with exactions for warres of Fraunce you shall no more be charged, for the king shall haue no nede, because that he by this league shal be the richest prince of the world for I assure you he shall haue more treasure out of Fraunce yerely, then all his reuenewes and customes amount to, yea and counte his wards, forfeits and all such casualties. Now syth you haue such an honorable peace and such a profitable peace, how much be you bounde to him which hath brought this peace about, for this peace is in secula seculorum. And because this peace is so noble, it is sealed with a seale of Gold, and so he caused all there present to looke on the seale, which was the very great seale of Fraunce printed in fine Golde: at thys tale many a man after laughed to thinke how the Cardynall lyed, for they knewe that that he sayde was for hys awne glorye, and nothing should folow as he sayde. A peace sealed with a seale of Gold

The French king according to his appointment sent the Lorde Annas of Momorancie great maister of his house, and after that high Constable of Fraunce, and the Bishop of Bayon, the chiefe President of Roan, and Mounsire de Hunyers, as his Ambassadors to the king of England accompanied with. lx. gentlemen well appointed, which the .xiiij. day of October landed at Douer, whose seruauntes demeaned themselues so in passyng through Kent, that muche businesse was to lodge them in London, but the Cardinall commaunded corporations of the Citie to prouide lodgyng for them, which was neuer seene before, where at the people murmured sore, saiyng that the Cardinall was all French. So on the twentie day of October the sayde Ambassadors were met on Black heth by the Marques of Exceter, the Bishop of London, the Vycount Rochforde, and Lorde Mountioy with many men of honor and gentlemen, to the number of fiue hundred A great Ambassade sent from the French king to the king of England.

horſes and more. The Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London, and the chiefe commoners on horſeback in their Gownes met the ſayde Ambaſſadors at ſaint Georges barre, and there was made to them a ſolempne oration, and ſo from thence they were conueyed through London to the Byſhop of Londons palace, and there and nere there about they were well lodged.

A preſent geuen by the Citie to the French Ambaſſadors.

The Citezens of London preſented them with fiue fat Oxen, fyue.ſcore, twelue Swannes, twelue Cranes. xij. Feſants, foure doſyn of Partriches, twentie loaues of Suger, Comfettes, and other ſpice, and Ware, and eyght Hoggeheades of Wyne with many other things, which I cannot rehearſe.

On Tueſday beyng the. xxij. daye of September, the ſayde Ambaſſadors were conueyed by water to Grenewiche, where before the king ſitting vnder his clothe of eſtate the foreſayde Mounſire Bayon preſident of Roan made an eloquent propoſition in the which he much thanked the king for ſendyng ſo higb an Ambaſſador as the Cardinall was, a man of ſuch prudence and wyt as it appered by the knitting of the league, that like to him coulde none be found, for by his onely mediation the two princes were accorded ſo ſurely as neuer were princes before that time, ſo that by this confederation the Pope and his Cardinals which were in captiuitie and thraldome ſhould by the power of theſe two Princes be deliuered, and all the Emperours power ſhould be cleane baniſhed and driuen out of Italy, and the Pope ſhould be reſtored to his olde eſtate and dignitie agayne.

When this oration was done and an anſwere made to the ſame, the king welcommed all the gentlemen of Fraunce, and then they had Wyne and ſpice brought to them, whereof they tooke part and dranke, and ſo departed to their Barge. Daily theſe Ambaſſadors repaired to the Cardinals place and there were highly enterteyned, and the morow after ſaint Simons daye and Jude, the Byſhop of Bayon and a great number of the Frenche gentlemen dined at the Maiors feaſt, & ſo they taried in London til Whalonday, on which day the king accompanied with the Ambaſſadors of Fraunce and all his nobilitie rode to the Cathedrall Church of ſaint Paule, where the Cardinall ſang Maſſe, & after Maſſe done the people were deſired to pray, that by their prayers Pope Clement might the ſooner be deliuered out of captiuitie: and when that was done the king of Englande before the aulter ſware to kepe and performe the league. The common people ſayde what neede all thys ſwearyng, the French king was once ſworne and all his nobilitie, yea and all his good townes, but yet they brake with vs, and ſo will they agayne when they ſee an auauntage.

The Ambaſſadors departed.

The next day the great maiſter and all his company tooke their leaue of the king (except the Byſhop of Bayon which abode as Ambaſſadour in Englande) and were highly rewarded, and ſo paſſed to Douer and tooke ſhip there and landed at Bulleyn.

After that the Frenchmen were departed the commons ſpake ſore agaynſt the Cardinall and ſayde that the Frenchmen did neuer good to Englande, and for the Cardinals pleaſure we ſhould forſake our olde friends and receiue our olde enimies. When the Cardinal heard of theſe ſayings he was not content, wherfore he ſent a commiſſion to the Maior of London to commaunde all men not to talke of the kinges affayres and buſineſſe, or of the Quene, or of the kings counſayle. And if any perſon ſpake or talked of any of these matters, then he to be taken and brought to the Cardinall. When this commaundement was once knowne, euerye man mistrusted other and no man durst breake his minde to other.

Now let vs speake of the army that the Lord Lawtrick had into Italy at the charges of the king of Englande and the French king for the deliuerance of Pope Clement. The Lorde Lawtrick after that his whole army was come to him to Lions, and that all things necessarie were in readinesse then he set forward with great diligence: but or he had passed the Mountayns, the Venicians army was come into Lombardy abiding the comming of the Frenchmen, and in the meane season, they marched towarde the Emperors army which lay at the Citie of Myllayne. Whereof heering Anthonie de Leua with eyght hundred Almaynes and Spaniardes on foote, and as many Italians marched forward to meete wyth them, and by force caused them to take the towne of Meligna for refuge, where he heering that John de Medices with a great number were comming toward the Venitians, he in the euening or his enemies were aware sodaynly set on the sayde John de Medices, which beganne to set his men in an order, but he was so enclosed that he could do nothing, but tooke his horse and fled, and left his companie alone, which were slaine almost all, and lost foure great peeces of ordinaunce, which Anthonie de Leua caryed with him to Millaine. In which season the Lord Lawtrick with his armie was passed the mountaines and was come to the Citie of Aster abiding the Swichers, where he heard tell how that Lewys Erle of Lodron with a great crew of Almaynes was come to the towne of Boske nie Alexandrie, with money and vittayle to ayde the Almaynes that kept Alexandrie: wherefore he sent hys horsemen to stop them that they should not passe to Alexandry, and after them he followed with his whole armie, and besieged them in Boske, which a certaine dayes defended, but at the last they yelded the towne, and became Souldiors to the Lorde Lawtricke. In this same season Andrew Dory Admyrall of the French naupe, lay before the hauen of Geane, and kept the Genowaies from all Marchandise and vittayles, which to the Citie might repayre, and in especiall he letted certaine shippes of corne which lay at Hont de Ferry, betwene Gene and Sauona, to come to Gene. The Genowayes which lacked corne, and were on the land side besieged by a Citizen of their owne whiche was on the French part called Cesar Fulgosus, imagined how to bring the shippes of corne into the Citie, and when they sawe that Andrew Dorye had but .xviij. Galyes. They prepared sixe Galleys to fight with Andrew Dory, during which fight the shippes with corne should enter the hauen. When the Galleyes were abrode, a sodaine tempest rose with such a violence, that Andrew Dory was faine to take the Port of Sauona for his succour, and so the shippes of corne came safe into the hauen of Gene, and all the Galleyes in safetie: this good was Fortune to Geane at this tyme.

The Army that was in Italy at the charges of the king of England.

When the Citizens of Geane were thus vitailed, they tooke to them good courage & in warlike maner issued out agaynst Cesar Fulgosus which knewe well that they had little more then three .C. Spanyardes that could skill of the warre, and as for the remnaunt were neyther of stomacke, nor of experience in warre, wherefore he boldly set on them, and while they were fighting without, the Citezens within which be euer mutable, sodainly cried

Fraunce,

Fraunce, Fraunce, which clamor came to the eares of Adurnus which was imperiall, wherefore he retired backe into the Citie to appeale the rumor, but their enemies folowed them in such haste that both entered together, and so Geane was become French. Then thether came the Lord Lawtrick, and put there a Capitaine with a retinue for the safe kepyng of the Citie. Then Adurnus Duke of Geane which was in the Castell with diuers of the Emperours frendes, and lacked vittayle, and sawe no comforte of rescue, yelded the Castell vpon condicion to depart with bagge and baggage, and so they did. In the meane season certaine Frenchmen which were left at Boske defaced the towne, and then came before Alexandrie, and there kept a siege volant that no ayde nor succour should come to the towne, till the whole armie were assembled to besiege the towne. But for all that purpose, by the Downes of Alexandrie, Abericke Barbian with fiue hundred souldiors came into the towne, which much comforted the garrison there, which was in maner dismayed because their ayde at Boske had fayled them. The Frenchmen besieged the towne and bet it with ordinaunce, and they within manfully defended it, and made newe countermures, so that their enemies could not enter without ieopardie. But at the last the Venicians brought thether great pieces of ordinaunce which so sore bet the walles, that Baptist Lodzyn the Capitaine sawe that he was not able to defend it, and so he deliuered the towne vpon this composition, that he and his should depart with bagge and baggage, and he nor his to weare no harnesse agaynst the French king, nor hys confederates by the space of sire Monethes. Then the Lorde Lawtrick deliuered the towne to Fraunces Sforcia accordyng to the league, whiche Fraunces put there a conuenient garrison. Thence that army remoued to Belgrasse which to them was yelded and also deliuered to the Duke of Millain, and from thence he remoued towarde the Citie of Myllain, whereof heerynge Anthonie de Leua fortefied the Castell of Millayn, and sent Leuys Barbian to defende the Citie of Pauie. When the Lord Lawtricke was within. viij. myle of Millain, he sodainly returned towarde Pauy, which men iudged to be done for the displeasure that was done there to the Frenchmen when theyr king was taken, and so the. xix. daye of September they besieged Pauye, and dayly betwene them were great skirmishes, but at the last they bet the walles so with great ordinaunce, that they made the towne assaultable. Then the Frenchmen threw into the ditches fagottes, and empty pypes, and shortly entered the towne. The Capitaine perceiuyng the towne entered, opened the gate and yelded himselfe prisoner. Then the Frenche men slue and killed on euery syde, robbed and spoyled houses, and Churches, and spared no person nor place, and of crueltie raunsomed one man fiue or six tymes, and the Gascoynes which were most cruell, set fyre on the fayre houses, and had brent the whole Citie, if the Lorde Lawtricke after seuen dayes spoylyng had not commaunded them to ceasse. When Pauy was thus taken and spoyled, the Lorde Lawtricke determined with the Cardinall Innocent Legate of Bonony, which was come for the deliueraunce of the Pope incontinent to passe to Rome, and to driue away all the Emperours power from thence, and to restore the Pope to libertie.

Fraunces Sforcia Duke of Millain heerynge of this determination, came to the Lorde Lawtricke to Pauie and required him first to rid the Duchy

Duchy of Myllayne of the Emperors ſouldiers rather then to go forwarde and leaue his enemies behinde him. The Lorde Lawtricke aunſwered that he was of the ſame opinion, but the commiſſion that he had of the French king and the king of Englande, was, that with all ſpede he ſhould go forward to deliuer the Biſhop of Rome, which done he faythfully promiſed that he woulde retourne and expulſe all the Emperors power out of Lombardy, and in the meane ſeaſon he woulde that the Duke and the Venicians ſhould beſiege Anthony de Leua in the Caſtell of Myllayne. Duke Fraunces ſemed to be content with this aunſwere, but yet he perceyued that the French king cared not for his reſtoring leaſt he ſhoulde be emperiall. So for ỳ time the Duke diſſimuled the matter, and toke poſſeſſion of the Citie of Pauie. When the Lorde Lawtricke had lien .xvj. dayes at Pauie, he diſmiſſed the Swychers which in no wiſe would go with him to Rome, wherfore he marched forwarde with his owne army and came to Pleſance where he concluded a league with Alphons Duke of Ferrer, and Frederick Marques of Mantua, ſo that then he knewe well he might paſſe in ſafety: and in good order of battail he marched toward Rome for the finiſhyng of his enterprice. But or he was paſſed out of Lombardie, the Emperour had ſent letters to the Biſhop of Rome, and excuſed hymſelfe that he neyther willed nor commaunded ſuch miſchiefe to be done, and ſtraightly commaunded his Capitaynes to deliuer him. The prince of Orenge and other Capitaynes of the Emperours heeryng his commaundement, tooke agreement with the Pope and his Cardinalles, and ſo he and .xij. Cardinalles were bound to performe certaine articles to the number of .xj. and then he was deliuered out of the Caſtell Saint Angell the tenth day of December, and was conueyed to Orpet, where after he had payed certaine money for the ſouldiors wages, he was put at full libertie, and the Emperours people departed from him, and thence he remoued to Ancona. When tidynges was brought into Englande of his deliueraunce, the Cardinall in great haſt cauſed Te Deum to be ſong on Newyeres day in the Kinges Chapell, and declared openly that he was eſcaped, and ſayd not deliuered, which made many men to muſe: and on Sunday the fift day of January, the Cardinall with great triumph came to the Church of Saint Paule in London, and on him attended diuers prelates of the Clergie, and there Te Deum was ſong again, and after that Doctor Capon openly declared, how that Biſhop Clement had bene long kept in diſtres by fault of Tyrauntes and Infidels, and ſo kept as priſoner to the behoofe of Charles the Emperour, till now of late through the prayers of good chriſten people, he was eſcaped the handes of his enemyes, for which cauſe hee willed all men to geue thankes to God: That night were great fiers made in the kinges Court, and in all London. Shortly after this, truth was knowen, that the Pope was deliuered by compoſition, and not freely eſcaped as the Cardinall had blowen abroade, but men ſayde that he could not leaue his lyng.

The Emperor deliuereth the Pope out of priſon.

Clement Pope deliuered.

Whyle the Lorde Lawtreck was thus paſſing towarde Naples, Syr Fraunces Poynes knight, which was ſent with Clarenſeaux king of armes into Spaine to the Emperour, returned into Englande before Chriſtmas, in the ende of December, and left Clarenſeaux behinde, to bring farther anſwere from the Emperour of things demaunded, wherof he ſayd he woulde take take longer aduice or he would answere. Thys syr Fraunces reported that the Emperour so much fauoured and esteemed the king of Englande, that at his only request and contemplation, he had released and discharged twelue articles, which were most grieuous and disprofitable to the French king, not for the French kings sake, but at the intercession of the king of Englande: yet this notwithstanding the Cardinall so inuegled the king, that he so highly fauoured the Frenche king, that all hys causes he toke and reputed as his awne, and did all that he might, to bring the french kings purposes about.

The Emperour before this time had written to the French king, and also aduertised thereof the Frenche Ambassadors that lay in Spaine, that he would that the French king should sende to him a diffinitiue aunswere, if he would withdraw his people out of Italy or not, and let the Duchie of Millaine alone, and to cease of all inuasions or not, and this aunswere to be taken for a defiaunce. Then the French Ambassadours before day shewed to the Emperour, the proffer which the French king offered to him in articles, as you haue heard before, in the conclusion taken at Amias by the Frenche king and the Cardinall in August last passed. Which proffers when the Emperour had heard and seene, he sayde to the Ambassadour, we thought surely that oure Colyn the Frenche king and we, had bene at a full conclusion, when the league and appointment was agreed at our towne of Madrill: for when he sued for his deliueraunce to vs, he and his counsayle offered vs certaine proffers, which we neuer demaunded, but we of pittie hauing compassion of his affliction, accepted the sayde offers, and agreed to his deliueraunce, which articles he promised in the othe of a king, and also on the holy Euangelistes, to perfourme to the vttermost, and them inuiolably to obserue and keepe. Wherevpon we cleerely remitted, and deliuered him into his countrey, of all which promises he hath perfourmed none, wherefore we take him as periured, and not worthy to be trusted, and now he offereth new offers, which he can not perfourme, as for the money we beleeue he is able to pay, but as for the money due for the kingdome of Naples, we knowe no such duetie, for it is our inheritaunce, although king Charles the seuenth, by subtiltie once vsurped the same, which he long not enioyed: as to release hys title to Millayne, that release is voyde, for the Duchie is imperiall, and in our gift as many other seigniories bee: and as touchyng Tournay, ours it is of right and now in our possession: So that in all these things he would release and render things that he had not: and as to the withdrawing of his armie out of Italy, he shall not nede, for we trust that our armie shall expell them all Italy, maugre their hartes. And as touchyng the king of Nauer, the Duke of Gelder, and Robert de la Marche, we of pittie let them alone till we see our time, and then they shall knowe our puyssaunce: And as touchyng his offer to ayde vs with a nauie, we trust we haue suche a nauie prouided, that we shall nede none of his: and where he sayth he will marry our sister Queene Alienor, daughter of Portyngall, if he had bene true, that he might haue done or this, but now we entend not to geue her to our enemie: and as touchyng her daughter to be maried to the Dolphyn, that we leaue in suspence for thys time: But where he sayth that he will defend vs, that toucheth our honour, for well knoweth he that our awne might and puyssaunce, hath euer defended vs, & him and his power hath defaced and banquished, quished, wherefore we neede not of his defence, which is not able to defend hymselfe: and as touchyng the king of Englandes debt, we shall reasonably aunswere his Ambassadours, for that toucheth not the French king: But nowe my Lordes Ambassadours sayde the Emperour, let the French king your Mayster fulfill the promise that he was sworne to, as a true Prince ought to doe, and then he shall haue his children delyuered, or else according to his othe, let him yelde himselfe prisoner agayne, and so shall his honor and truth be saued or else not, so with this aunswere the Ambassadors departed. Neuertheless they dayly sued to the Emperour and his counsayle to take the offers which were profered by the french king, and amongs other things the warre was sore layde to the French Ambassadours charge, for that that the French king made warre on the Emperours possessions, without cause and without defiaunce, to which accusement they aunswered that that armie was procured by the Cardinall of Englande, when he was at Amyas, for the deliuery of Clement Bishop of Rome, and that the king of Englande bare the most charge.

The Cardinall procured warre against the Emperor for the delyuery of the Bishop of Rome.

When the Emperour heard this aunswere, he sent for the Ambassadour of Englande, and to him saide: My Lorde Ambassadour, I much maruaile why the king your maister hath so great loue to the French king, his newe reconciled friend, and withdrawne his loue from me, that am his Cosyn and alie: How fortuneth this that your olde auncient enemies be now in fauour and your olde friendes cast out of fauour. I see well there is indignation had at our estate, and waies sought to griene vs, which we hope to withstand: But who would haue thought that our Uncle of England, would haue made warre on vs? How would he haue vs graunt his requestes and desires for the frenche king, seyng he sheweth himselfe our open enemie? Then the Ambassadour discretly aunswered, that he neyther heard nor knewe of such doyngs, on his fayth and honor. Well sayde the Emperour, if it be true that is reported, mine Uncle is not the Prince that I haue taken him for, and if he be mine enemie, I must withstande him, and in a great furie, the Emperour withdrew him from the Ambassadour to his priuie chamber.

The saiyng of the Emperor vnto the king of Englandes Ambassadors.

Daylie the Ambassadours both of Englande and of Fraunce, sollicited the Emperour and his counsayle, to accept the French kings offers, which made euer aunswere, that they would not trust to the newe promise, seyng that the olde promise which was sworne, was not obserued and kept.

Nowe whosoeuer indifferently shall consider the articles which were offered in the treatie of Madrill, and the articles offered now at Amias, shall openly perceyue, that the greatest thing which the frenche king refused to doe, was the deliuerie of the Duchie of Burgoyne and the Countie Charolops, for declaration whereof, the french king sent for all the nobles of both the countreyes, and declared to them thys promise and concorde taken with the Emperor, which aunswered that no realme or dominion could be transferred to any forreyn prince or person without the sentence, agreement, and submission of the nobles, and commons of the same countrey, and therefore they would neuer assent to that alteration: This answere was deliuered to Lorde Charles de la Noa Viceroy of Naples, then Ambassadour for the Emperour in Fraunce, which thereof certefied the Emperours counsayle. But the Emperour and his counsayle thought this to be but a deceyte, in so much much as the French king had onely called suche of Burgoyne as him pleased, and not the substantiall of the countrey. And farther the Emperour so much desired the Duchie of Burgoyne, because he was the very heire there of bloud descended from Duke Philip, sonne to king John of Fraunce, that by no meanes he would haue that article broken, but that he would haue that Duchie. The french king perceyued his minde and offred to him great sommes of money for the redeeming of that article, the king of England also offred to be suretie for the payment: but all this could not moue the Emperour but he would haue Burgoyne, and all the sayde treatie and agreement performed.

The king of England considering how much he had done for the Emperor, and calling to his remembraunce, both that the Lordes and commons of Spayne, would not haue taken him as king (his mother liuing (although she were Lunatike) because she was heire, without his great labour and intercession, & also that he holpe him to be elected Emperor, which the French king had obtayned, if he had not put therunto his ayde, and sent Doctor Richarde Pace his Secretorie to the Electors of Franckefordе, and most of all that he at all times, had succored the sayde Emperor with mony and was not payed, wherefore he was not a litle displeased with the Emperors wylfulnesse, but more with his vnkindnesse, and perceyued clerely, that sith by his meanes he was so exalted, that now he had forgotten all the kindnesse to him shewed, wherefore he thought to make him to knowe himselfe by warres, the soner to bring him to accomplish his request, and to make him to remember his olde kindnesse, and so by the aduice of the Cardinall of York (which loued not the Emperor, for the Bishop of Romes cause) and other of his counsaile, he sent word to Clarenseaux king at armes, to make defiaunce to the Emperor, and so Guyan Herault for the French king and the sayde Clarenseaux for the king of Englande, the. xiiij. day of January, in the City of Burgues in Castile, came before the Emperor beyng nobly accompanyed with Dukes, Marquesses, Erles, and Barons, in his great hall, and there made their defiaunces.

Richarde Pace Secretorie.

Defiaunces made to the Emperor.

When the defiances were made by both the kings of Armes, as you haue heard, al the nobles which were present, as ꝑ Constable of Castile, ꝑ Duke of Malledonia the Duke of Inuaricaso, the Duke of Alberkirke, ꝑ Duke of Ciuill, the Duke of Nallaw, or Nazareth, the Duke of Aluoy, the Marques of Sturgus the Marques of Aguiar, the Marques of Villafranca, ꝑ Erle Barcelon, the Erle of Salamatero, ꝑ Erle Bonluent, the Erle Arowen, the Erle Aguilard, the Erle Salienas, the Erle Geneuer, with six great Lordes Cõmendatories Crolled, & many other noble men & Gentlemen, for a truth to the number of seuen hundred at the least: all these drew out their swords and sware that the defiaunces, then made should be reuenged, and sayd to the Emperor: Sir if the despyte of this defiaunce be vnreuenged. the infamy and rebuke thereof shall remayne to vs and our heires for euer, wherfore our landes, liues and lordshippes, shall be at your commaundement, and while any lyne of your succession remayne, this ignominie shal be euer new and not die, till you haue obtained ꝑ double honor, against all your enemies.

When the Emperor was thus defied, the warre was proclaymed in Ciuill, in Valedolite, in Burgus, and other places through all Spaine: But when when the common people heard of this defiaunce, they wrong themselues by the Berdes and sware, that all their landes and goodes, shoulde be spent for the honor of the Emperor, and to be reuenged on the French king, whom they called the periured Prince, and so the common people cryed in the streetes, now is come the time, that Spayne shall be renoumed, and reuenged on the frenchmen for their falsenesse, and wrong doynges. But alas sayde they, why shoulde we make warre with the Englishe nation, which euer loued vs and neuer offended vs: but this defiaunce procedeth not of them, but onely of the French king, and of the Cardynall of Englande, which is sworne French: thus the Spanyards talked, and euer excused the king of England and accused the Cardinall, and sayd that he had a great pencion out of Spain and that notwithstanding, because he might not haue the Bishoprike of Toledo, he caused all this warre. This proclamation of warre was proclayned with banners displayed, in the which were paynted a red sworde, & a Cressel burning, against the French king and his partakers, not mening the king of England, by expresse name, but it was rehersed in the proclamation, that the king of England had manaced, and defied the Emperor, in the French kings quarrell. Then were the English Marchauntes in Spayne attached and their goodes put in safe custody, and to them was sayed that they were stayed onely, till the Emperor was aduertised how his subiectes were ordered in England.

Tydings of this was first knowne in Fraunce, and from thence letters were sent to the French Ambassadors in London, how both the Ambassadors of Fraunce and of England, beyng in Spaine, and Guyen and Clarenseaux officer at Armes, were retayned by the Emperor as prisoners, which report was false, for they were at libertie, and well cherished, and in especiall the English Ambassadors and Clarenseaux, were friendely entertayned in all places. When the Cardinall heard this report he was too light of credence (which he repented afterward) and was sore therwith moued, and in his fury the .xij. day of Februarie, he caused Don Hugo de Mendosa, the Emperors Ambassador, to be taken out of his house, in Saint Swithines lane in London, and to be brought to sir John Dauncys place in Marke lane, as a prisoner, and his house with his goodes were kept by the Cardinalles seruauntes, till the kinges pleasure were farther knowne.

The morow after being the .xiij. day of Februarie, the Cardinall being in the Starre chamber, called before him all Justices of ỳ peace, and other honest personages to a great number, and to them sayde: My Lordes and all you the kynges louing subiectes, his graces pleasure is that I should declare to you, how that his highnesse, not of his owne seeking, but rather against hys will and intent, is entered into warre. For the elect Emperor Charles the fift, hath him so handled & moued, that he must of necessity with him make warre. First it is not vnknowne to you all, how good the king hath bene to him, sith his infancy, how he hath defended his low countries during his noneage: yea, what payne the king toke by his Ambassadors, to solicite the Lordes of Spaine, which refused to take him as their king, while his mother liued, and by the kinges onely labor, he came to the kingdome of Spayne, what it cost the king to helpe him to be Emperor, we that be his counsaylors can tell, for if the king had not beene, surely the French king had beene Emperor. Beside all these kindnesses, he hath lent to the sayd Emperor, diuers great sommes of money, to defend his countryes, and what profite his countryes haue by the resort of Englishemen thether, you that be Marchants can tell, for these things with many mo profites, cõmodities, & gratuities, the king of him is so litle regarded, that I am halfe ashamed to report it. True it is that Fraunces the French king, was to him prisoner (which chaunce hath happened to many high Princes) the kyng our maister, highly regarding the peace of christen Princes, by which peace God might the more be glorified: desyred the Emperor to take some reasonable ende for his deliueraunce, and for that purpose hath sent to him sundry Imbassadors, which gaue them eares, but dalied with them, and nothing would doe at all, and regarded no more his requestes, then I would the desire of my seruaunt (and peraduenture not so much) so that for all gratuities and friendships to him, by the king our soueraigne Lord, at all times shewed, he sheweth himselfe ingrate and vngentle, and for kindnesse rendreth vnkindnesse, as for the french king I assure you, he hath humbled himselfe as much as a prince may, his honor saued. He hath offered him so great offers, that except he should geue hym hys realme and crowne, he can offer no more larger, which offers I assure you, sore minishe the dewtie of his crowne, which I shall briefely declare vnto you. For he offereth to paye fiue hundred thousande poundes sterling, whereof three hundred thousande, to be payed in hande, for the remnaunt sufficient Bankers to be bounde, and farther to discharge the Emperor, of all such sommes of money, as he oweth to the king of England, and to deliuer him a sufficient acquittance for the same. Also where the French king should haue out of the kingdome of Naples an hundred thousande Crownes yerly, the French king will release the same pencion, with all the arrerages which are no small some. Also he will release his whole title and right which he hath to the Duchie of Millayne, his very inheritaunce, and neuer he to challenge or clayme the same nor his posteritie. Also where the Countie of Flaunders maye lawfully appeale to the parliamentes of Fraunce, from iudgementes geuen by the Emperor or his Justices, he is content to release the same superiority and resorte, which is a great minishment to the prerogatiue royall or the realme of Fraunce, for which of you (sayd the Cardinall) would consent that the king should release his signiorie or superiorities of Wales, Irelande or Cornewall, I dare saye you would rather spende your liues and goods.

Farther, where the French king bought of the king the Citie of Tournay, for fiue hundred thousand Crownes, and odde, yet he is content to yelde and release the same Citie to the Emperour for euer, yea, and beyde this, he offereth to take to wife, Elianor Queene Dowager of Portingale, without any dower, yea, in her kirtell, and to indue her with ten thousand Markes sterlyng by the yere, and farther that the childe if it be a Male, which shall be gotten of them two, shal be Duke of Burgoyn, and be partaker of all the honours of Fraunce, which is a great thing: Also that the Dolphyn his sonne and heyre, shall marry the daughter of the sayde Ladie Elianor, without any treasure to be receyued for the same, which proffer is worth two hundred thousand Markes sterlyng.

conuey him to Rome, and also defend him agaynst all men, yea, what will he do more, although the king of Nauarre haue maryed his awne sister, whose kingdome the Emperour kepeth by force, yet he offereth neyther to ayde nor comfort him agaynst the Emperor, but in his quarell to be agaynst him: Also he offereth to forsake his olde and approued friendes, Sir Robert de la Marche, and the Duke of Gelders, which faythfully hath serued the realme of Fraunce, and all for the Emperors sake. But the Emperour sayde he, is so indurate, so vnkynde, and wilfull, that he neyther regardes these reasonable requestes, nor yet the kinges prayers nor requestes, but aunswered and sayd: that if the French king can do all this, he shall haue his children. So that the Emperor will trust no man, but euery man must trust him: Yet the French king offereth farther, to withdraw the puyssaunt army of the Lorde Lawtrick in Italy, and yet the same passeth prosperously forward, and is like to do the Emperour more disaduauntage, then I will nowe reherse: but the Emperour is so prowde, and his people so cruell, that he nothing regardeth these offers: for what a crueltie was this, to pull downe Goddes Vicar of Rome, and persecute the holy fathers by extreeme tyranny, violated the holy Sacrament, and threwe the hostes downe on the Aultare, and like robbers tooke the Pixe: and farther in the Church, they violated Virgins, and stupred Matrones, and dispoyled the holy Reliques of the Citye of Rome. And like as the king in huntyng tyme hath slayne three hundred Deere, and the garbage and paunches be cast round about, in euery quarter of the Parke, so (sayd the Cardinall) euery streete lay full of the priuie members and gentures of the Cardinalles and holy Prelates: the whole history were to abhominable to tel. Yet notwithstandyng all these offers mocioned, and nothing regardyng this detestable tyranny, the which euery good Christen man abhorreth, he will encline to no reason, I am sure that I coulde shewe you. xx. articles of promise, which he hath broken with the king: so that I assure you he kepeth no promise with our soueraine Lorde, also contra ius Gencium, which I am sure the great Turke would not doe, he kepeth prisoner the kinges Imbassador Doctor Lee, the French Imbassador, & the Imbassador of Venice: and forasmuch as the Emperor refuseth these offers, which amount to eyght kinges raunsomes, I trust by this warre, we shall bridle him, and bring him to peace, and this occasion of warre, I would all you shoulde declare in your Countrie.

When the Cardinall had sayde, some knocked other on the elbowe, and sayd softly he lieth, other sayde, that euill will sayde neuer well, other sayde that the French Crownes made him speake euill of the Emperour, but they that knew al that you haue heard before said, that it was shame for him to lie in such an audience. The cõmon people much lamented, ỹ warre should arise betwene the king & the Emperor, and especiall their consideration was, because the Emperors dominions, had holpen them with corne, & relieued them with grayne, when they could haue no corne, or little out of Fraunce. And in this rumor were diuers ships come out of Flaunders, and that parties, laden with Hering, Sturgion, & al other vitaile necessary: beside eight fayre ships, which were laden with corne, all the sayde ships, & all the ships of Spaine, were stayed and arested, and their sayles taken from them, and put in safe custodie. This doyng was much talked of by Marchauntes, which frequented the Emperours Dominions, for they knewe and openly sayd, that the let of the entercourse of Marchauntes, shoulde turne to the great losse of the Princes, but yet the Englishe men were content to obey theyr King and his Counsayle.

The declaration of warre in England against the Emperour, and the restraint of shippes of the Emperours subiects, were shortly knowne to the Lady Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, and aunte to the Emperor, which was gouernor of Flaunders, Brabant, and Zeland, and of all the lowe Countries: wherefore she by the aduice of the Emperours Counsayle to her associate, caused all the Englishe men, and their goodes and shippes to be restrayned, and they and theyr goodes were put in safe keeppyng. Thus the poore Marchauntes suffered great losse, for the doynges of their Princes, as Horace sayth: Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur achiui. whatsoeuer kings do, the Cõmons be punished. Now after this sodaine storme, which the Cardinall had moued openly agaynst the Emperour for euill entreatyng of the kinges Ambassadour, he had perfect knowlege that the Emperour, both did the kings Ambassador great honour, and also that he neuer restrayned him from his libertie, whereupon he caused the Emperors Ambassador, which before was restrayned of his libertie, to be sent to his owne lodgyng agayne, and sayd that by the report made by the French Ambassadors, he him restrayned, and now sithe he knew the truth, he motioned the king for his deliueraunce.

The Emperours Ambassador, called Don Hugo de Mendosa, dissimuled the matter by apparant signes: and the Cardinall the more to auoyde suspicion on his behalfe, towarde all the worlde, sayde: the king was informed by the French Ambassadours, that the Ambassadours of both Princes were put in prison, and further he sayde, that Clarenseaux had made the defiaunce to the Emperour without the kings commaundement, but onely did it by the motion of the French Ambassadors, to accompanie the French Herauld, and for this presumpteous act, he should suffer death at Calice at hys returne: all these excuses the Cardinall shewed to the Emperors Ambassador, which certefied the Emperor of euery poynt, and sent the letter by poste into Spaine, which letters were opened & copied, by the Capitaine of Bayon, as the post passed that way. And when Clarenseaux returned homeward out of Spaine, the Capitaine gently shewed to him the copie of the letters, that the Emperors Ambassador had written. Thinke you not but Clarenseaux was dismayde, to heere his dayes so short: yet he trustyng in his truth, and grace of his Prince, passed forward and came to Bullein, where he heard worde agayne of the daunger that he was in, wherefore like a wyse man he left Calice, and tooke a ship at Bulleyn, and landed at Rye, and came secretly to Hampton Court, where the king laye, and by friendship of sir Nicholas Carew, one of the kinges priuie Chamber, he was brought to the kinges presence, or the Cardinall wist of his returne, and to him shewed the three letters, which the Cardinall had sent to him, chargyng him to make the defiaunce, or he did intimate the warre. He declared further, that neyther the Ambassadors of the king, nor the Frenche king, nor he were neuer sequestred from libertie, but gently enterteyned, and to the king he shewed a chaine to the value of seuen hundred Ducates, which the Emperor had geuen him, and shewed also the Copie of the Emperors Ambassadors letters, which he had had at Bayon. When the king had heard all the circumſtaunce of his declaration, he muſed a great while, and ſayde, O Lorde Jeſu, he that I truſted moſt, tolde me all theſe thinges contrary, well Clarenſeaux, I will bee no more of ſo light credence hereafter, for nowe I ſee perfectly, that I am made to beleue the thing that was neuer done.

The wiſe ſayeng of the king.

Then the king ſent for the Cardinall and priuily talked with him, but whatſouer he ſayde to him the Cardinall was not very mery, and euer after that time, the king miſtruſted him. When the king and his counſayle had well digeſted the Emperours aunſwere, and his gentle demeanor toward the kings Ambaſſadors, and alſo had pondered that the lowe Countries of the Emperour, were glad to pleaſe the king of Englande and his ſubiects: wherefore the king commaunded ſyr John Style knight, to diſcharge all the Dutchmen and their ſhippes, and to deliuer their ſayles, and gaue them lycenſe to returne: Nay ſayde the Dutchmen, the Spaniardes and we be the Emperours ſubiectes, why ſhould not they be alſo diſcharged? Sir John Stile aunſwered them, that his commiſſion was onely to diſcharge them. The Dutchmen fearing that the frenchmen would take the ſeas before them and ſo to ſtop them departed haſtely, curſſing the Cardynall as aucthor of this warre.

The king now beginneth to ſmell the falſhod of the Cardinal

When the Lady Margaret hard tell, how the Dutche nation with their Shippes and goodes were releaſed, and not the Spaniardes, ſhee ſent for the Engliſhe Merchaunts, and to them ſayde: Sirs, ſithe the king your maiſter hath deliuered onely the Dutchmen, and not the Spaniardes, we releaſe your bodies free to go at your libertie, but your goods ſhall remaine till we knowe what ſhall become of the Spanyardes, and when they be deliuered come for your goodes, and you ſhall haue them deliuered, thus the Engliſhe men departed, and came to the king, and declared to hym and hys counſayle how they were entreated.

This warre with the Emperour was diſpleaſaunt, both to Marchants and clothiers, for the Marchauntes durſt not auenture into Spaine, ſithe Apryll laſt paſt, and now was come the .xj. daye of Marche, wherefore all brode clothes, Kerſeis, and Cottons, lay on their handes. In ſo muche as when the clothiers of Eſſex, Kent, Wilſhire, Suffolke, and other ſhires which vſe cloth making, brought clothes into Blackwell hall of London, to be ſolde as they were wont to doe: fewe Marchaunts or none bought anye cloth at all. When the Clothiers lacked ſale, then they put from them their ſpinners, carders, tuckers, and ſuche other that lyue by clothworking, which cauſed the people greatly to murmure, and eſpecially in Suffolke, for if the Duke of Norfolke had not wiſely appeaſed them, no doubt but they had fallen to ſome riotous act. When the kings counſayle was aduertiſed of thys inconuenience, the Cardinall ſent for a great number of the Marchaunts of London, and to them ſayd: Sirs the king is informed, that you vſe not your ſelues like Marchaunts, but like Graſiers and artificers, for where the clothiers doe daylie bring clothes, to your market for your eaſe, to their great coſt, and there be ready to ſell them, you of your wilfulneſſe will not bie them as you haue bene accuſtomed to doe: what maner of men be you ſayde the Cardinall? I tell you that the king ſtraighly commaundeth you to bie their clothes, as before time you haue bene accuſtomed to doe, vpon paine of his high displeasure.

The Marchaunts aunswered, my Lord you knowe well that we haue had no trade outward thys twelue Monethes past, and we haue so manye clothes in our handes, that we knowe not how to vtter them, therfore it were great losse to vs to bye any more: wherefore we trust you will not moue vs to bye the thing which we can not vtter, for in all places our vent is stopped and forbidden. Well sayde the Cardinall, if you will not bie the clothes at Blackwell hall, they shall be brought to the whyte hall at Westminster, and so you of London shall lose the libertie, and the king shall bie them all, and sell them to Marchaunt straungers. Then aunswered a wise Marchaunt, my Lorde, the king may bie them as well at Blackwell hall, if it please him, and the straungers will gladlier receyue them there, then at Westminster: You shall not order that matter sayde the Cardinall, and first I will sende into London, to know what clothes you haue in your handes, and that done the king and his counsayle shall appoint who shall bye the clothes I warrant you, with this aunswere the Londoners departed.

When the clothiers hard that the Cardinall toke their part, they waxed prowde, and spake euill of the Marchauntes, and when the Marchauntes came to bye clothes, the Clothiers set them hire, then they were accustomed to be solde: but at length they were faine both to abate the price, and also to seeke of the Marchaunt men, for all the Cardinals saiyng.

If this warre was displeasaunt to manye in Englande (as you haue heard) surely it was as much or more displeasant, to the townes and people of Flaunders, Brabant, Holland, and Zeland, and in especial to the townes of Andwarpe and Barrow, where the Martes were kept, and where the resort of Englishe men was, for they sayde that their Martes were vndone, if the Englishemen came not there, and if there were no Marte, their Shyps, Hoyes, and Wagons might rest, and all artificers, Hostes, and Brokers might sleepe, and so the people should fall into miserie and pouertie: of these things daylie complaynts were made to the Ladie Margaret, and the Emperours counsayle, which wisely pondered the complaynts, and after long consultation had, they appoynted certaine Ambassadors to go to the king of Englande, and entreat for a truce, or abstinence of warre, which Ambassadors came into Englande, and associated themselues with Don Hugo de Mendosa, Ambassador there for the Emperor: the one Ambassadour was Prouost of Cassell, and the other maister John Lay souereigne of Flaunders: these three Ambassadors came to the king the xxix. day of Marche to Richemond, and after reuerence done, the Lorde Hugo de Mendosa sayde to the king, sir the Emperors Maiestie so much knowlegeth himselfe bound to your grace, for manifolde kinde actes and beneuolences done and shewed to him sith his tender age, that he in no wise will take the defiaūce, done by your Herault as a peremptory intimation of warre, tyll he had heard farther of your pleasure, and therefore his counsayle hath sent hether these two noble persons and me, to knowe your determinate aunswere, and finall resolution in that behalfe. The king after a good auisement had, aunswered and sayde: Of warre I am nothing ioyfull, and of warre I am lesse fearefull, I thanke God I haue no cause to care for warre, for I haue both men and money, and all thing ready prepared for the same, (which things I know that other princes lack, for all their high wordes) and therefore to that question of warre I could fone agree, but or I make you a determinate aunswere, some part of my minde I will declare to you, and I tell you although your master be a great Emperour and a mightie prince, I cannot nor maye not suffer him to beare downe and destroy the realme of Fraunce, which is our true inheritaunce, and for the which our brother and alie the French king, payeth vs yerely a great pention and tribute, wherefore we of iustice and equitie, muste maintaine that lande, out of which we haue so faire a rent, and such a profite.

Then sayde the Prouost of Cassell, yea syr and it please you to call to your remembraunce, the olde and auncient loue and familiaritie which hath beene betwene your realme, and the houses of Burgoyne and Flaunders, and the lowe countreys, I assure you the people of all those Countreys will liue and die with you, aboue all men next their souereigne Lorde, wherfore most noble prince neuer consent, that olde loue that hath so long contynued, be now broken and seperated: we say this for no feare, for we be well furnished for warre, both of men and strong Castels, all which before thys time hath bene at your commaundement, and therfore the loue that we haue euer borne you, we continue and offer you nowe to continue: and where we offer you choyse of warre or peace, at your pleasure, surely the Emperor meaneth that for your honour, as though you should commaund which you would: and if you chose warre, we haue commission to entreate for peace, and you chose peace, we haue like commission to thanke you, and to offer vs and ours at your commaundement. Then sayde the Lord Hugo de Mendosa to the king, syr of verie right the Emperour and his countries ought to haue your loue and fauor, before the frenche king and his Nation: for the frenchmen in the time of their affliction, made humble suites and requestes to your grace, which they neuer would do in the time of their prosperity, but the Emperour hath euer continued one man at all times, wherefore he is better to be trusted, then they which neuer were long true to you. Well said the king, sithe I haue well perceyued the intent of your comming, I will be auised, and then I will make you an aduised aunswere, and in the meane season I am content that there be an abstinence of warre for a time, so the Ambassadors departed for a season, and the Prouost of Cassels, daparted to the Lady Margaret with this aunswere.

After this the king which was wyse, well learned, and a farre casting Prince, consulted with his Counsaile of this matter, and there after long debatyng it was considered, that the king was riche, strong, and puyssaunt ynough to make warre with any Prince Christen, and that no Prince coulde hurt him by warre or inuasion, therefore some thought it best to haue warre, but the king and the wyser sort considered that if he had warre with the Emperor, that his marchauntes should leese much, and if they lost, the Clothiers and the Clothworkers, of which were a great multitude should leese and be brought to extreeme pouertie. For it was considered that the Emperor was Lorde of all Spaine, Naples, Sardinia, and so southwarde to Epuskaia, and likewyse northeastwarde from Grauelyn, to Rye and Reuell, so that Englishe Marchauntes passyng on those costes were euer in daunger. Also no flame could come into England, but through his dominions, by reason where of cloth makyng should decay. Wherefore the king considered, if the marchauntes lost, the poorer sort should leese, and at length he should leese in his customes. Wherefore leauyng the glory of warre, he tooke mercye on his subiectes and concluded to take a peace for a tyme, till farther communication might be had betwene his counsail and the Emperors. And vpon this poynt letters were sent into Spaine, Fraunce, and Flaunders, and so this matter continued vndetermined till aunsweres were brought from outwarde partes.

The suite of the French Imbassadors

In this season the bishop of Bayon which afterwarde was Bishop and Cardinall of Parys beyng Imbassador from the French king, and soiournyng in London, heard tell howe the Emperours Imbassadors made much suite to the king and his Counsaile, wherefore he came to the Court, and desired to speake with the king, and so was brought to the kinges presence, to whome he sayde: pleaseth your highnesse to consider the great and highe peace that is concluded betwene you and your louyng brother, and perpetuall alye the French king my mayster, which is ratified and confirmed by the three estates of the realme of Fraunce, by the which you haue yerely twentie thousand pound sterlyng, which realme you haue promised to defend against all persons. Nowe in the wyng your loue that ye beare to the Frenche king and his subiectes, if you would make sharpe warre on the Emperors subiectes, I assure you the whole realme of Fraũce would take it so thankfully, that it should neuer be forgotten.

Well sayd the king, as touchyng the league and amitie betweene my brother of Fraunce and me, it shall be inuiolately kept for me, but sir to enter into warre it needeth no counsaile, but howe to ende warre with honour and profite, men must needes studie. As touching the defence of the realme of Fraunce, I assure you it shall be defended to my power, though it be to my losse, and my study is no lesse to haue a peace which might be more honourable to your mayster then to mine owne selfe. With which saiyng the Imbassador helde him well contented. So that you may perceiue that the great pencion and profite that the king of England had out of Fraunce with the great league and amitie concluded and sworne, was the very cause why the king of England so much held with the French king and not for mere loue. For this matter was dayly great counsayles, and one day the Emperors Imbassador was present, another day the French kings Imbassador was present, but the Cardinall was euer on the French part. So thus continued this dayly counsayles with great studie.

In the same season, a Frenche Crayer of. xxx. Tonne, manned wyth xxviij. Frenchmen, lay at Margate to wayte for a praye of some Flemyng that should come out of the riuer of Thames, and by chaunce a Crayer of Armew which was apointed to waft the fisher botes betwene Graueling, & Ost ende, was come by North of Goodwyn sandes, to Northland head, and so came to Gravesend and tooke in bread. This Crayer was of. xviij. tonne and had in her. xiiij. Flemynges: When she was victayled she made to the sea ward, and sodainly she espyed the Frenchmen which houed vnder a saile. The Flemynges mistrusted, and incontinent put themselues in a readinesse, and came so nye that he hayled the Frenchman then ỳ Frechman shot a piece of ordinaunce, and with that layd the Flemyng aboorde, there was sore fightyng, for the Frenchmen had Crossebowes, and the Flemynges had Handgunnes.

gunnes. The Frenchman fell of and would haue bene gone, that seeyng the Flemyng whistled, and after the Frenchman made sayle. Nowe the winde was so straynable East, that the Frenchman could sayle no whether, but into the Thames, and so he did and the Flemyng folowed, and before Graueſend the Flemyng boorded the Frenchman, and there they fought againe, but away agayne went the Frenchman, and the Flemyng after with all his sailes and so farre sayled the Frenchman, that he ranne along the Tower wharfe as though he would haue ryuen his shippe, the Fleming set on and entered the shippe for any thing the Frenchman could do, and cryed I haue taken the theefe. Sir Edmond Walsingham Lieuetenaunt of the Tower was on the Wharfe, and sawe them fight, called his men and entered the shippes, and tooke both the Capitaynes and theyr men. The Flemyng boldly chalenged his pryse, for he sayde that open warre was betweene Fraunce and Flaunders, and sayde farther, that the Frenchman was a Pirate: The kings counsaile tooke vp the matter and made an ende betweene them. Thys chaunce was much talked of that two shippes should sayle in chase from Margate to the Tower Wharfe, because that before tyme suche a lyke thing had neuer beene heard.

A ship chased to the tower wharfe.

Now let vs returne to the Lorde Lawtricke, which had gotten manye townes in Italy, and had with his great armie besieged the Citie of Naples and so it happened that the Prince of Orenge and other Capitaines the. xix. day of Aprill set on a great part of the frenche army, and notwithstandyng their hardinesse, the Emperors army obteyned the victory, so that from that tyme forth the french men lost, what by pestilence which then was great in Italy, and what by sodaine skirmishes.

The king kept the day of saint George with the companions of the order of the Garter with great solemnitie at his Manor of Richemond, where to him came tidynges of the army of the Lorde Lawtricke in Italy, which letters shewed that the Lorde Lawtricke had sent the Lord Peter de Nauarro the thirde day of March last past to a great towne called Melffe with ten thousand Frenchmen, and within the towne were eyght hundreth Spanyardes good men of war: The Lord Peter de Nauarro besieged the town, and after gaue to the same a great assault, but the Spanyardes so defended them with ordinaunce and resistences, that they slue fiue or sixe thousande Frenchmen, and caused them to retreate. The Lorde Lawtricke heeryng this, came in person wyth a great number to the towne of Melffe, and marueylously bet the towne with ordinance and then gaue to it a great and fierce assault, and therwith so sore that the Spaniardes were put backe, yet they defended them, so that it was marueyle to behold, for they slue and destroyed foure. M. Frenchmen. The French army entred the towne on all sydes, and yet the Spanyards kept the market with their ordinaunce as long as they might, but at the last beyng oppressed with multitude, they all were slaine without mercy, so cruell were the Frenchmen: In this towne was taken the Prince of Melffe, a noble man pertaynyng to the Emperor. Thus was the towne of Melffe taken and spoyled, not greatly to the Frenche mennes profite, for they lost almost tenne thousande men whiche sore diminished theyr power.

Although that this season was an abstinence of warre taken betweene the

the king of Englande and the Ladie Margaret, so that the dutch Nation might safely come and go into Englande, and the Englishemen might safely repaire thether, yet betwene the Frenche men and the Flemynges was hot warre on the Frontires, and manye a prisoner taken, and manye men slayne, and likewise the one part tooke the other on the seas, and sometime the Frenchmen would spoyle Englishe ships, saying that they had Flemings goodes or Spaniardes goodes, and likewise the Flemings would enter the Englishe ships, and say they had Frenchmens goodes, so the English men lost, till the king sent shippes to keepe the sea: But for a truth the Spaynardes were strong on the sea, and to the French men did much harme. The king perceyuing that there was nothing concluded betwene the Emperor and him, thought not to be behinde hande, wherefore he ordayned that the Lord Sandes should passe to Guisnes with a thousand souldiours that was fiue hundred archers, and fiue hundred horsemen, and that the Duke of Suffolke should passe ouer after with a great armie to inuade Flaunders. These Lords made much preparation, and mustered their men at the Mantels beside saint Johns and was ready to depart, but the Emperours Imballador and the Imballadour of Flaunders, so much did with the king and his counsayle (and the French king also assented) that truce was taken betwene England, Flaunders, and the countreys of Pycardy on this side the water of Some for eyght Monthes, the peace to beginne the first daye of May, and to endure to the last day of Februarye. This peace was proclaymed in London, the .xix. day of June, so that nowe all Englishe men might lawfully passe into the lowe Countries but not into Spaine: which sore grieued Marchauntes that haunted that parties. In the same proclamation was farther conteyned, ỳ if a finall peace were not fully agreed betwene the sayde three princes within the sayde eyght Moneths, that then all Marchaunts should haue two Moneths after to passe into their owne countries with their wares and marchaundises in safetie. The Emperour sone enclined to this peace, for he sawe that by the warre many of his friends in high Dutchland and other places toke great profite, and especially his owne lowe Countries, wherefore he thought not to hurt his friendes, for the displeasure he bare to his enemies of Fraunce, and also to shewe himselfe louing to the king of Englande he was content to take this peace.

In this season the Duke Charles of Gelders perceyuing the Emperor was at warre with Fraunce, raised a great power of horsemen and came to a great towne of Holland called the Hage, where the lawe and iustice is kept for that countrie, by reason whereof the towne was verie riche, and sodainely he entred the towne without resistence, and spoyled and robbed the towne, and slue diuers persons and with much riches laded their Wagons and so departed and caryed with him diuers riche prisoners. The Ladye Margaret gouernesse of the lowe countries heering of thys raised a great power vnder the conduyte of the Lorde Isylsteinge, which Lorde with a great puyssaunce entered Gelderland and tooke the towne of Hatton, the Castell of Howting and forraged and destroyed the countrie lastly on Whitsonday, beyng the last day of Maye, the Gelders gaue battayle to the Lorde Isylsteinge and fought valyauntly as any men could doe, but yet by fortune of warre they were ouercome and fled, and were chased a great waye and many many slayne. This chaunce was whyle the treatie of peace was in England.

In the verie ende of May began in the Citie of London the sickneſſe called the ſweating ſickneſs, & afterward went through all the realme almoſt, of the which many dyed within fiue or ſixe houres. By reaſon of this ſickneſſe the terme was adiorned and the circuites of Aſſiſe alſo. The king was ſore troubled with this plague, for diuers died in the courte, of whome one was Sir Fraunces Poynes, which was Ambaſſador in Spaine, and other, ſo that the king for a ſpace remoued almoſt euery day, tyll at the laſt he came to Tytynhangar a place of the Abbot of ſaint Albones, and there he with a fewe determined to bide the chaunce that God would ſend him, which place was ſo purged daylie with fyres, and other preſeruatiues, that neyther he nor the Queene nor none of their company was infected of that diſeaſe, ſuch was the pleaſure of God. In thys great plague died ſyr Wylliam Compton knight, and Wylliam Cary Eſquire, which were of the kings priuie chamber, and whome the king highly fauoured and many other worſhipfull men and women in Englande.

Sir Wylliam Compton

By reaſon of this plague the watches which were wont to be kept yerely in London on ſaint Jhons eue at Midſommer & ſaint Peters eue, where by the king & his coũſail cõmaunded to be left for that yere, wherfore the Armorers made great ſuit to the king and declared their great hinderaunce which was not ſo much conſidred as the miſchiefe that might haue enſued if that ſo great a nũber ſhould haue aſſembled together in ỳ hote time, & the plague of ſweating raigning. Now let vs leaue England al this ſomer ſeaſon troubled & vexed with this ſweating ſickneſſe, & let vs returne to the affaires of Italy.

Midſommer watch in London was layd downe this yere.

In this ſeaſon was through all Italy a vniuerſall warre, famine and peſtilence, or a morepn whereof the people died in euery place, and in eſpecially in the Dukes armie which cauſed the moſt part of the Almaines to returne into their countrey, wherefore the Duke wiſely conſidered ỳ chaunce and ſaw that his armie was greatly miniſhed by death, and ſaw farther that for lacke of vittayle and money he was not able to conuay the remnaunt of his armie to Naples, by the aduiſe of Anthony de Leua concluded to returne, and ſo ſhortly after in good order returned, and loſt more by the peſtilence then by his enemies.

The French king was aduertiſed by the Lord Lawtrick how his people decayed ſore before Naples, and how the Duke of Brunſwike was comming to raiſe the ſiege and reſcue the Citie, wherefore the French king ſent Lorde Fraunces Erle ſaint Poul brother to the Duke of Vandoſme with eyght thouſand men to folowe the Duke of Brunſwyke to Naples, and if he went not to Naples, then he ſhould ioyne himſelfe with Fraunces Sforcia Duke of Millayne and the Venecians, and ſo expell Anthony de Leua and all the Emperours ſouldiours out of Lombardy.

The Spaniardes within Naples were aduertiſed that new ſuccors were comming to the Frenchmen, wherfore they determyned to fight with them or their new ayde came, and ſo one day they iſſued out of the Citie and fought with the Frenchmen and ſlew many of them, but by force they were compelled to returne. The Lord Lawtricke knew well that the Citie could not hold long for lacke of vittayle (for a ſuertye if vittayle had not come by Sea, the towne had beene yelded) wherefore the Lorde Lawtrike ſuffered his his army to lie ſtill in the plaine field all the heat of the Sõmer and brought them not to the ſhadow, by reaſon whereof there fell ſuch a diſeaſe amongſt his army, that they died dayly in great number and he him ſelfe fell ſick & left the army and lay at Uerſe, of the which mortallitie there died in the French campe aboue .xxiiij. M. men, beſide the moſt part of all their horſes & beaſtes of which number as diuers writers doe agree there dyed aboue fiue thouſand Gentlemen, amongeſt whome there dyed the Lorde Uademount brother to Anthony Duke of Lorraine, the Lorde of Grauntmount, the Capitayne Malyac, the Lorde Lauall of the Dolphenye, the Capytaine Luper, the Lord Charles Uyuone, Lorde of Chatepgneray ſonne to the Lorde Andrew of Uyuone Seneſchal of Poytew, & many other noble men of name.

The death at Naples.

During which plague the towne of Cap (which moſt of all the townes in the realme of Naples helde on the Frenche part) became imperiall and turned to the Emperors part: Whereof heering the Lorde Lawtrick, made therefore great ſorrow, and being ſomewhat amended of his diſeaſe, tooke his horſe and came to viſite the Campe, and when he ſaw his number ſo minished and hys Campe ſo deſolate of people that he perceyued that his enterpriſe could not be perfourmed, he fell into ſuch a malencholy that his ſickneſſe tooke him more feruently then before, ſo that within two dayes after, which was the one and twentie day of Auguſt he dyed at and his body was ſered and conueied after into Fraunce.

The Marques of Saluce which was Liuetenaunt vnder the Lorde Lawtricke called to counſaile the Erle Guy of Rancon and Peter de Nauer and other Capitaynes that were left, & after long conſultacion they conſidered their number to be to ſmall eyther to kepe the ſiege or to abyde battayle, for they paſſed not fiue thouſand in all. Wherefore they concluded to leaue the ſiege and to returne, and ſo the fiue and twenty day of Auguſt they brake vp their Campe and returned toward Fraunce, in which returne the Spaniardes euer coaſted them, and when they tooke any Frenchmen at aduauntage, they eyther ſlew or toke them. Thus was the end of this iorney by reaſon of the great mortalitie, which if it had not happened, the Citie and the whole realme of Naples had bene recouered: For the citie of Naples could not haue holden ten dayes, after the army remoued as they confeſſed after.

The returne of the king of England and the French kinges camp out of Italy.

Now let vs returne to the king of England which was in a great ſcruple of his conſcience and not quiet in his minde, becauſe that diuers Diuines well learned ſecreatly enformed him that he liued in adultery with his brothers wife to the great peryll of his ſoule, and tolde him farther that the Courte of Rome could not diſpence with Gods commaundement and precept. Theſe thinges were talked among the common people ſith the firſt day of his mariage as you haue heard before, inſomuch that now the kinges counſaylors aduiſed hym to know the truth. Wherfore he like a wiſe Prince for quyeting of his conſcience called together the beſt learned of the realme which were of ſeuerall opinyons, wherfore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges leaſt peraduẽture the Spaniards in fauor of the Queene would ſay that his owne Subiectes were not indifferent iudges: wherfore he wrote his cauſe to Rome becauſe the beſt clerkes in Chriſtendome were there, and alſo he ſent to all the vniuerſities of Italy and Fraunce and to the great Clerkes of all Chriſtendome to know their opinions, and deſired the

Now was the king fully enformed that he liued in adultery.

Court

Courte of Rome to sende into his realme a Legate to heare the cause debated which should be indifferent and of a great iudgement. At whose request the whole cõsistory of the College of Rome sent hether Laurence Campeius a Priest Cardinall, a man of great wit & experience, but more learned in the papall law then in diuinitie, which was sent as Legate into England the .x. yere of this king as you haue heard in the sayde yere, and with hym was ioyned in commission the Cardinall of Yorke and Legate of England, and so this Cardinall Campeius by long iourneys came into England, and much preparation was made to receyue hym triumphantly into London, but he was so sore vexed with the Gout that he refused all such solempnities, and desired hartely that he might wout pompe be conueied to his lodgyng for his more quyet and rest, & so the ninth day of October he came from saint Mary Ouerys by water to the Bishop of Bathes place without Temple barre where he lodged the last time he was in England: Where he was visited of the Cardinall of Yorke and diuerse other estates and prelates. And after he had rested him a season and was somewhat releeued of his payne, he was brought to the kinges presence then lyng at Bridewell by the Cardinall of Yorke, and was caried in a Chayre of Crimosin Veluet borne betweene foure persons for he was not able to stande, and the Cardinall of Yorke and he sate both on the right hand of the kinges throne, and there one Francisco Secretary to Cardinall Campeius made an eloquent Oration in the Latine tongue, in the which he rehersed, first with what crueltie the Emperors souldiers had handeled the Pope, what tyranny they had shewed to the Cardinalles and Priests, what sacrilege and spoyle they had committed in sayne Peters Churche, how they had violated Virgyns, rauished mens Wyues, and in conclusyon spoyled, robbed and tormented all the Romaines and inhabitaunts in the Citie of Rome: and farther he shewed what friendshipe the College of Rome found at the kings handes and the French kings in the time of that tribulation, that if they had not ioyned together, the Citie of Rome with all their gouernors had beene brought to vtter ruyne and decay, for the which he sayd that Pope Clement and all his College of Cardinalles and the Senators of the Citie with all the Citizens rendered to the kyng their hartie thankes, and promysed him their loue, fauor, and amytye perpetuall.

Cardinall Campeius commeth to London.

The Oratiõ.

This oration (as concerning the trouble of Rome) was set forth with such lamentacions, & such abhominable actes and tyrannies, that the most part of the herers thought it more eloquent then true. To the which oration Doctor Fox Prouost of Cãbridge made a discrete answere: And as to the first poynt he declared that the king muche lamented to heare his friendes yea or any other christen men to be ordered or handled with such tiranny & oppression: And as touching the second poynt he sayd, that the king did but the dutie of a Christian Prince to releue his friendes beyng in captiuitie, for the which he would that the whole Citie of Rome shoulde geue thankes to God and not to him. After which answere made, the two Legates commoned secreatly wyth the king a long space, and after departed to their lodging.

The answer.

Of the comming of this Legate, the common people beyng ignorant of the truth, and especially women, and other that fauoured the Queene, talked largely, and sayde that the king would for his awne pleasure haue another wyfe, and had ſent for this Legate to be deuorced from his Queene, with many fooliſhe wordes, inſomuch that whoſoeuer ſpake agaynſt the mariage was of the common people abhorred and reproued, which common rumor and fooliſhe communications were related to the king, wherefore he like a prudent Prince and circumſpect doer in all his affayers, and willyng all men to knowe his intent and purpoſe, cauſed all his nobilitie, Iudges, and Counſaylors, with diuers other perſons to come to his Palace of Bridewell on ſunday the. viij. day of Nouember at after noone in his great chamber, and there to them ſayde as nere as my witte coulde beare awaye theſe wordes folowyng. Hall.

The kinges Oration concerning hys firſt mariage.

Our truſtie and welbeloued ſubiectes both you of the nobilitie, and you of the meaner ſort, it is not vnknowne to you howe that we, both by Gods prouiſion, and true and lawfull inheritaunce haue reigned ouer this realme of England almoſt the terme of. xx. yeres, During which tyme we haue ſo ordered vs, thanked be God, that no outward enemie hath oppreſſed you nor taken any thing from vs, nor we haue inuaded no realme, but we haue had victorie and honour, ſo that we thinke that you, nor none of your predeceſſors neuer liued more quietly, more wealthie, nor in more eſtimation vnder anye of our noble progenitors: But when we remember our mortalitie, and that we muſt dye, then we thinke that all our doyngs in our lyfe tyme are clerely defaced, and worthie of no memorie, if we leaue you in trouble at the time of our death. For if our true heyre be not knowne at the tyme of our death, ſee what miſchiefe and trouble ſhall ſucceede to you and your children. The experience wherof ſome of you haue ſeene after the death of our noble Grandfather king Edward the fourth, and ſome haue heard what miſchiefe and manſlaughter continued in this realme betweene the houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter, by the which diſcention this realme was lyke to haue bene clerely deſtroyed. And although it hath pleaſed almightie God to ſende vs a fayre daughter of a noble woman and me begotten to our great comfort and ioy, yet it hath beene tolde vs by diuers great Clerkes, that neyther ſhe is oure lawfull daughter, nor her mother our lawfull wyfe, but that we liue together abhominably and deteſtably, in open adultery, inſomuch that when our Imbaſſade was laſt in Fraunce, and motion was made that the Duke of Orleaunce ſhould marry our ſayde daughter, one of the chiefe Counſaylors to the French kinge ſayd. It were well done to know whether ſhe be the king of Englands his lawfull daughter or not, for well knowen it is, that he begat her on his brothers wyfe, which is directly agaynſt Gods law and his precept. Thinke you not my Lordes that theſe wordes touch not my bodie and ſoule, thinke you that theſe doyngs do not dayly and hourely trouble my conſcience and vexe my ſpirites, yes we doubt not but and if it were your alone cauſe euery man would ſeeke remedie when the perill of your ſoule, and the loſſe of your inheritaunce is openly layde to you. For this onely cauſe I proteſt before God & in the word of a Prince, I haue aſked counſaile of the greateſt Clerkes in Chriſtendome, and for this cauſe I haue ſent for this Legate, as a man indifferent onely to knowe the truth, and to ſettle my conſcience, and for none other cauſe as God can iudge. And as touchyng the Queene, if it be adiudged by the lawe of God that ſhe is my lawfull wyfe, there was neuer thing more pleaſaunt, nor more acceptable to me in my life, both for the diſcharge charge and cleeryng of my conſcience, and alſo for the good qualities and condicions the which I knowe to be in her. For I aſſure you all, that beſide her noble parentage, of the which ſhe is diſcended (as all you knowe) ſhe is a woman of moſt gentleneſſe, of moſt humilitie and buxumneſſe, yea, and of all good qualities apperteinyng to nobilitie, ſhe is without compariſon, as I this.xx. yeres almoſt haue had the true experiment, ſo that if I were to marry againe, if the mariage might be good, I would ſurely chooſe her aboue all other women: But if it be determined by iudgement that our maryage was againſt Gods law & clerely voyd, then I ſhall not onely ſorow the departyng from ſo good a Ladie and louyng companion, but much more lament and bewaile my infortunate chaunce, that I haue ſo long liued in adultery to Gods great diſpleaſure, and haue no true heyre of my bodie to enherit this realme. Theſe be the ſores that vexe my minde, theſe be the pangues that trouble my conſcience, and for theſe grieues I ſeeke a remedie. Therefore I require of you all as our truſt and confidence is in you, to declare to our ſubiectes our minde and entent, accordyng to our true meanyng, and deſyre them to pray with vs, that the very truth maye be knowne for the diſcharge of our conſcience, and ſauyng of our ſoule, and for the declaration hereof, I haue aſſembled you together, and now you may depart.

To ſee what countenance was made amongſt the heerers of this Oration it was a ſtraunge ſight, for ſome ſighthed and ſayde nothing, other were ſory to here the king ſo troubled in his conſcience. Other that fauoured the Queene much ſorowed that this matter was now opened, and ſo euery man ſpake as his heart ſerued him, but the king euer laboured to know the truth for diſcharge of his conſcience.

Shortly after this, the two Legates came to the Queene at the ſame place of Bridewell, and declared to her howe they were deputed Iudges indifferent betweene the king and her, to heere and determine whether the maryage betweene them ſtoode with Gods law or not. When ſhe heard the cauſe of their commyng, no marualle though ſhe were aſtonnied, for it touched her very nere. And when ſhe had paused a while ſhe anſwered.

The ſaiyng of the Legats

Alas my Lordes is it now a queſtion whether I be the kinges lawfull wife or no? When I haue bene maried to him almoſt.xx.yeres, and in the meane ſeaſon neuer queſtion was made before? Diuers Prelates yet beyng aliue, and Lordes alſo, and prime Counſaylors with the king at that tyme, then adiudged our marryage lawfull and honeſt, and now to ſay it is deteſtable and abhominable, I thinke it great marualle: and in eſpeciall when I conſider what a wiſe Prince the kinges father was, and alſo the loue and naturall affection, that king Fardinando my father bare vnto me: I thinke in my ſelfe that neyther of our fathers, were ſo vncircumſpect, ſo vnwyſe, and of ſo ſmall imagination, but they foreſaw what might folow of our mariage, and in eſpeciall the king my father, ſent to the Court of Rome, and there after long ſuite, with great coſt and charge, obteyned a licence and diſpenſation, that I being the one brothers wife, and peraduenture carnally knowne might without ſcrupull of conſcience, marry with the other brother lawfully, which licence vnder lead I haue yet to ſhewe, which thinges made me to ſay and ſurely beleue, that our maryage was both lawfull, good and Godly: But of this trouble I onely may thanke you my Lorde Cardinall of Yorke, for because I haue wondered at your highe pride and vaine glory, and abhorre your voluptuous life, and abhominable Lechery, and little regard your presumptious power and tiranny, therefore of malice you haue kindeled this fire and set this matter abroche, and in especiall for the great malice that you beare to my nephew the Emperor, whome I perfectly know you hate worse then a Scorpion, because he would not satisfie your ambicion and make you Pope by force, and therefore you haue sayde more then once, that you would trouble him and his frendes, and you haue kept him true promise, for of all his warres and vexations, he onely may thanke you, and as for me his poore aunt and kinswoman, what trouble you put me to, by this new found doubt, God knoweth to whome I commit my cause accordyng to the truth. The Cardinall of Yorke excused himselfe, saiyng, that he was not the beginner, nor the mouer of the doubt, and that it was sore agaynst his will, that euer the mariage should come in question, but he sayde that by his superior the bishop of Rome, he was deputed as a Iudge to here the cause, which he sware on his profession to heere indifferently, but whatsoeuer was sayde, she beleued him not, and so the Legates tooke their leaue of her and departed. These wordes were spoken in French, and written by Cardinall Campeius Secretory, which was present, and by me (sayth Hall) translated as neere as I coulde.

The queenes aunſwere.

The Queene imputeth the cauſe of her diuorſe vnto Cardinall Wolſey.

The Cardinall excuseth himselfe.

The king notwithstanding that his minde was vnquiet, yet he kept a good countenaunce towarde the Queene, with as much loue, honor, and gentlenesse, as could be shewed to such a princesse, but he absteyned from her bed till the truth was tryed, according as his ghostly counsayle had auised him, which was to him no little paine, for surely he loued her as well, as anye Prince might loue his wife, and shee him againe, and therfore it was great pytie, that their mariage was not good.

The more to quicken his spirites, and for recreation, the king kept his Christmas at Grenewiche, with much solempnitie and great plentie of Uiands, & thether came the two Legates, which were receiued by two Dukes and diuers Erles, Barons and gentlemen, to whom the king shewed great pleasures, both of Iustes, Tornays, Bankets, Maskes, and disguisings, and on the Twelfe day he made the lawfull sonne of Cardinall Campeius borne in wedlock, knight, and gaue him a coller of. S.S. of Golde: but the Quene shewed to them no maner of countenance, and made no great ioy of nothing, her minde was so troubled.

Cardinall Campeius sonne made knight.

This doing in Englande was spred ouer all Christendome by letters, and in euery region except Spaine, and the Emperors dominions, they adiudged the king a wise, a verteous, and a prudent Prince, for tryng out of the truth, considering that the question was not onely doubtfull to learned men in diuinitie, but vpon the vncertainetie of the same, depended the ruine of his realme, and the succession of the same, which was a waightie thing to consider, and no wisedome to let so great a doubt lye vndiscussed.

After Christmas and all Lent till Easter, was none other thing commoned of, but onely of the kings mariage, the Archbishop of Cauntorburie sent for the famous Doctors of both the Uniuersities to Lambeth, & there were euery day disputations, and commonings of thys matter, and because the king perceyued and knewe well, that the Queene was wedded to her awne opinion, and that he would that she should doe nothing without counsayle, he bad her chose the best Clarkes of his realme, to be of her counsaile, and licensed them to doe the best on her part that they could, according to the truth: then she elected Wylliam Warham Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and Nicholas West Bishop of Elie, Doctors of the lawes, and John Fysher Bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standishe Bishop of saint Asse, Doctors of Diuinitie, and manye other Doctors and well learned men, which for a suretie like men well learned: defended her cause as farre as learning might defend it.

In the beginning of thys yere, in a great Hall within the black Friers of London was ordeyned a solempne place, for the two Legates to sit in, with two Cheyres couered with cloth of Golde, and Cushions of the same, and a Dormant table railed before, like a solempne Court, all couered with Carpets and Tapissery: on the right hand of the Court was hanged a cloth of estate, with a Chayer and Cushions of riche Tissue, for the king, and on the left hande of the Court, was set a riche Chayer for the Queene. When the place was readie, the king and the Queene were scited by Docter Sampson, to appere before the Legates, at the forenamed place, the twentie and eyght day of May, beyng then the morrowe after the feast of Corpus Christi, in proper person, or by their Procters. At the day assigned, the Legates came to the forenamed place, with Crosses, Pillers, Ares, and all the ceremonies belonging to their degrees, and after that they were set (the Cardinall of Yorke sitting on the right hande) their commission was red, and the cause of their comming thether openly declared, the effect whereof was, that the Court of Rome was instructed, that great Clarkes and learned men had enformed the king, that his mariage with his brothers wyfe was vnlawfull, dampnable, and directly agaynst the lawe of God, wherefore they were directed and appointed by the sayde Court, to bee Judges in the cause, and to heare what on both parties could be alleged: after this was done, the king was called by name, for whome two Procters appered, then the Quene was called, which within short space, beyng accompanied with the foure Byshops and other of her counsayle, and a great company of Ladies and gentlewomen folowyng her, came personally before the Legates, and after her obedience, sadly and with great grauitie done, shee appeled from them, as Judges not competent for that cause, to the Court of Rome, and after that done, shee departed agayne. Notwithstanding thys appeale, the Legates sat weekely, and euery day were arguments on both partes, and nothing else done.

The Courte at the Black Friers.

The Quene appealed.

The king which onely desired to haue an ende in this matter, for discharge of his conscience, came to the Court the of June, and the Queene also, where he standing vnder his cloth of estate, sayde these wordes in effect folowyng: My Lordes, Legates of the sea Apostolique which be deputed Judges, in this great and waightie matter, I most hartely beseech you, to ponder my minde and intent, which onely is to haue a finall ende, for the discharge of my conscience: for euerye good christian man knoweth what paine and what vnquietnesse he suffereth, which hath his conscience grieued, for I assure you on mine honor, that thys matter hath so vexed my minde, and troubled my spirites, that I can scantly studie any thing, which should be profitable for my realme and people. And for to haue a quietnesse in body and soule is my desire and request, and not for anye grudge that I beare to her that I haue maried, for I dare say that for her womanhood, wisedome, nobilitie, and gentlenesse, never prince had such another, and therefore if I would willingly chaunge, I were not wise: wherefore my suite is to you my Lordes at this time, to haue a speedie ende, according to right, for the quyetnesse of my minde and conscience onely, and for no other cause as God knoweth.

When the king had sayde, the Queene departed without any thing saiyng, then she was called, to knowe whether she would bide by her appele, or aunswere there before the Legates, her Proctor aunswered, that shee would bide by her appele, that notwithstanding, the counsaylours on bothe sides every day almost met, and debated this matter substantially, so that at the last the Diuines were all of opinion, that the mariage was against the lawe of God, if she were carnally knowne by the first brother, (which thing she clerely denied) but to that was aunswered, that Prince Arthur her husbande, confessed the act done, when he called for drinke earely in the morning, saiyng: that he had beene in Spaine that night, which was a hote countrie, meaning that he had carnally bled her, farther at the time of the death of Prince Arthur, shee thought and iudged that she was with childe, and for that cause the king was deferred from the tytle and creation of the Prince of Wales, almost halfe a yere, which thing could not haue beene iudged, if she had not bene carnally knowne.

Also she her selfe caused a Bull to be purchased, in the which were these wordes, Vel forsan cognitam, which is asmuch to say, as peraduenture carnally knowne, which wordes were not in the first Bull graunted by July, at her second mariage to the king, which second Bull with that clause was onely purchased, to dispence with the second matrimony, although there were carnall copulation before, which Bull neded not to haue bene purchased, if there had bene no carnal copulation, for then ꝑ first Bull had bene sufficient.

When the Diuines on her side, were beaten from that ground, then they fell to perswasions of naturall reason, how this shoulde not be vndone, for three causes: one was because if it should be broken, the onely childe of the king, shoulde bee a Bastard, which were a great mischiefe to the realme: Secondly the seperation should be a cause of great vnkindnesse, betweene her kindred and this realme. And the third cause was, that the continuaunce of so long space, had made the mariage honest: These perswasions with many other, were set forth by the Queenes counsaile, and in especiall by the Bishop of Rochester, which stoode stiffe in her cause, but yet Godes precepte was not aunswered, wherefore they left that grounde and fell to pleading, that the Court of Rome had dispensed with that mariage: To thys some Lawyers sayde, that no earthly person is able to dispence with the positiue lawe of God.

When the Legates had heard the opinions of the Diuines, and sawe that their opinion for the most part was agaynst the Matrimony, and that nowe the question was brought to dispute, the authoritie of the Court of Rome, they began a little to quicken: For they considered that if they should say and determine, that the Court of Rome might not dispence in that case, that that few men would thinke, that they might dispence in any other case, which should be to them a great losse and hurt. Wherefore they dissimuled the matter, and euer tolde the king, that he should haue an ende shortly, and tracted forth the time with Orations and Sophisticall arguments, till Iuguſt began to approch: then Cardinall Campeius sayd, that they might not sit after July, till October, all which season was a vacation in the Court of Rome, and their Court beyng a member of the Court of Rome, they must needes doe the same: this saiyng was reported to the king, which by that saiyng knewe perfitely that he should then haue no ende, and then he complayned to the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, and other nobles of his counsail, how he was delayed, and wylled them at the next Session, to require them, to make an ende of the cause, and what iudgement soeuer they gaue, he would gladly accept it, for the quietnesse of his conscience.

An oration made by Cardinall Campeius to delay the kings suite.

These noble men came to the place, where the Legates sat, the thirtie day of Iuguſt, beyng Fryday, whereas Cardinall Campeius, declared in eloquent Latin, and sware on his honor and fayth that he bare to the church of Rome, that the course of the courtes there be, at the end of July, to suspend all causes, till the fourth day of October, and if any case be treated, and iudged in the meane season, that iudgment to be clerely voyde, and therefore he required the king to take patience til that time, trusting that then they should proceede towarde sentence, so that he should be contented: the Noble men desired them to make an ende, whatsoeuer it were, that day or the next day, which was the last day of July: but they aunswered that they coulde sit no more till October, which aunswere sore displeased the noble men, which the king had sent thether, insomuch that Charles Duke of Suffolke, seyng the delay, gaue a great clap on the Table with hys hand and sayde: by the Masse, now I see that the olde sayde saw is true, that there was neuer Legate nor Cardinall, that did good in Englande, and with that saiyng all the Temporall Lordes departed to the king, leauing the Legates sitting one loking on the other sore astonied, because they saw the Temporall Lordes depart in anger.

The saiyng of Charles Duke to Suffolke.

You may be sure, that the king was not well content, when he heard of this delay, but yet like a wise Prince, he tooke it paciently, trusting to haue an ende in October ensuyng: But when he heard tell, that a letter was sent for the Cardinall Campeius, that he should wyth speede, returne into Italy, and that he prouided for his iorney: Then he openly perceyued, that the Legates dissimuled the time to haue the matter in the Courte of Rome, for the mayntenaunce of their auctoritie, knowyng perfitely, that there he should be foded forth with argumentes so long that he should be in maner wery, and also all that time, he shoulde be vnquyet in his conscience, which was the greatest care, that he had, but the second care that he tooke, was to see the Cardinall of Yorke (whome he so highly fauored and trusted, and whome he had so highly promoted, both to the Archbishopricke of Yorke, and the Bishoprickes of Wynchester, Bureſme, and the Abbey of saint Albons, with many other great dignities and promotions, beside the Chauncellorship of Englande) so vnfaithfully to dissimule with him, and not to open the very truth, which caused him clerely to cast him out of his fauor, in the which he had long bene.

The promotions giuen to the Cardinall of Yorke.

When

The king frowning vpō the Cardinall euery man was in his necke.

When the Nobles and Prelates perceiued, that the kinges fauor was from the Cardinall sore minished, euery man of the kinges Counsayle, began to lay to him such offences, as they knew by hym, and all their accusations were written in a Booke, and all their handes set to it, to the number of thirtie and foure, which Booke they presented to the kyng. When the king saw the Booke he marueiled not a little, for by the articles conteyned in the same, he euidently perceaued the high pride and coueteousnesse of the Cardinall, and saw openly with what dissimulation and clokyng, he had handled the kings causes: how he with fayre lyeng wordes, had blinded and defrauded the king, most vntruly, which accusations sore moued the king agaynst hym, but yet he kept it close for a time, and so the king rode on his progresse with the Quene to Woodstock. And at the feast of the natiuitie of our Lady, he came to Grafton, beside Stony Stratford, and thether came the two Legates, and were but meanly receyued, sauing that the king made to them good semblaunce, and in especiall to Cardinall Campeius, because he came into England at his request: and after dinner the saide Campeius toke his leaue of the king, and then the king him conueied to the Chamber dore, and there they departed, and the Cardinall of Yorke also went with his companyon to Tocester, and on the morrow he came to Grafton to speake with the king, which was then ryding out on huntyng, and he sent him worde by Henry Norreis, that he should accompany Campeius to London, and when the king came to London, he woulde more common with him: thus almost dismayed the Cardinall of Yorke, returned to his companyon to Tocester, and so they came together to London, where to the Cardinall Campeius, were deliuered great rewardes, and so he tooke his iorney toward the Sea side, where the kinges counsayle, caused his chestes and cariages to be opened to se what letters the Cardinall of Yorke had sent to the court of Rome, and there were but a fewe letters founde, for they were sent before in poste, but in many chestes were founde, olde hosen, olde coates, and such vile stuffe, as no honest man would cary to haue it, which search much displeased Campeius, and the more because his coffers were likewise opened in Chepe, by the rashnesse of a Moyle, as you haue heard in the tenth yere of the king.

The last time the Cardinall came to the kinges presence.

Thus departed out of England in high displeasure, the craftie Cardinall Campeius, leauing behinde him his subtill felowe, which after their departing from the kyng at Grafton, neuer saw the king, nor came in hys presence. This great Session of the Legates, was communed of through Christendom, and in especially in Spayne, and other the Emperors dominions, which sore grudged that the Quene should be diuorsed from the king: and suerly the most part of the lay people of Englande, which knew not the law of God, sore murmured at the matter, and much the more, because there was a Gentlewoman in the court, called Anne Bulleyne, daughter to Sir Thomas Bulleyne, Viscount Rocheford, whome the king much fauored in all honestie, and suerly none otherwise, as all the world well knew after.

The king now beginneth to fauor Lady Anne Bulleyn.

The king which all the .xx. yere past, had beene ruled by other, and in especiall by the Cardinall of Yorke, began now to be a ruler and a king, yea, a king of such witte, wisedome, and pollicie, that the like hath not reigned ouer this realme, as you shall plainely perceyue hereafter: as well for the setting forth of true doctrine, as also for the augmentation of his Crowne. For when when he perceyued, how the Cardinalles had handeled him, and saw plainly that the law of God was clere, that he might not marry his brothers wyfe, thought to sende his Ambassadors to all the Vniuersities in Fraunce, and Italy, to know their determinatiõs, and for that cause he sent Doctor Stokesley, and Doctor Fore, two great Clerkes into Fraunce, which sped as you shall heere hereafter declared, when the matter serueth.

The king continually studiyng on this matter, called a counsaile of the chiefe of his Nobles, to begin at Westminster, the first day of October next ensuyng, and also commoned a Parliament, to begin the thirde day of Nouember, then immediatly folowyng, and declared that the same Counsaile, should deuise diuers actes, necessary and needefull to be passed at the sayde Parliament, for reformation of certain exactions, done by the Clergie to the lay people, to which Counsaile and Parliament, the Cardinall was warned and commoned, which much comforted him, that he outwardly little abashed: and so he and all the Counsaile, came to the counsaile Chamber at Westminster, and there dyuers dayes commoned of diuers thinges, but nothing was fully concluded, and there the Cardinall shewed himselfe, much more humbler then he was wont to be, & the Lordes shewed themselues more higher and straunger, then they were wont to be, but for all that he abashed not hys countenaunce, but came into Westminster Hall with all his traine, the first day of the Terme: but none of the kinges seruauntes would go before, as they were wont to do, and so he sate in the Chauncery, but not in the Starre Chamber, for all the Lordes and other the kinges Counsaile, were gone to Windsore to the king, where they enformed the king, that all thinges that he had done almost, by his power Legantine, were in the case of the Premunire and prouision: and that the Cardinall had forfeited all his landes, tenemẽts, goodes, and cattayles to the king: Wherefore the king willing to order him, according to the order of his lawes, caused his attournay Christopher Hales to sue out a Writte of Premunire agaynst hym, in the which he licenced him to make an attourney.

The Cardinall in the Premunire.

And farther, the .xbij. day of Nouember, he sent the two Dukes of Norfolk & Suffolk, to his place at Westminster, to fetch away the great Seale of England, which he was loth to deliuer, if there had bene any remedy, but in cõclusion he deliuered it to the two Dukes, which deliuered the same to Doctor Taylor maister of the Rolles, to carry it to the king, which so did the next day: and beside this ỹ king sent sir William Fitzwilliam knight of the garter, and treasurer of his house, and doctor Stephin Gardiner, newly made secretary, to see that no goodes should be embesiled out of his house: and further ordeined that ỹ Cardinal should remoue to Asher beside Kingston, there to tary the kings pleasure, and to haue all things deliuered to him, which were necessary for him, but not after his old pompeous & superfluous fashion: For all his goodes were seazed to the kinges vse. When the seale was thus taken from the Cardinall, the Dukes of Norffolke & Suffolke, with many Erles, bishops, and Barons, came into the Starre Chamber, the .xix. day of October, wher the Duke of Norffolke declared that the kinges highnesse, for diuers and sundrie offences, had taken from him the great Seale, and deposed him of all offices, & least that men might complaine for lacke of iustice, he had appoynted him and the Duke of Suffolke, with the assent of the other lords to sit in the Starre Chamber, to heere and determine causes indifferently, and that of all things the kings pleasure and commaundement was, that they should keepe their handes close, from any rewardes taking, or maintenance, and so that weeke they sat in the Starre Chamber, and determined causes.

to

The Cardinalles remouing from yorke place.

On the day of the same moneth, the Cardinall remoued out of his house called Yorke place, with one Crosse, saying, that he would he had neuer borne more, meaning that by his Crosse, that he bare as Legate, which degree taking was his confusion, as you see openly, and so he tooke his barge and went to Putney by water, and there tooke his horse, and rode to Asher, where he remayned till Lent after.

During which time, he beeing called on for an answere in the kinges Benche, to the Premunire, for geuing benefices by preuension, in disturbaunce of mennes enheritaunce, and diuers other open causes in the Premunire: he according to the kinges licence, constituted John Scute, and Edmond Jenny, apprentices of the Lawe, his attournayes, which by hys awne warrant signed with his hand, confessed all things concerning the said suite, for they were to open to be cloked or hidden, and so iudgement was geuen, that he should forfeyt all his landes, tenementes, goodes, and Cateles and should be out of the kinges protection, but for all that the king sent hym a sufficient protection: and of his gentlenesse left to him the Bishoprikes of Yorke and Winchester, and gaue to him plate and stuffe conuenient for hys degree, and the Bishoprike of Duresme, he gaue to Doctor Tunstall Bishop of London, and the Abbey of Saint Albones, he gaue to the Prior of Norwich, and to London he promoted Doctor John Stokesley, then Ambassador to the Uniuersities, for the kinges mariage, as you haue heard before. For all these kindnesse shewed to the Cardinall, yet he still maligned against the king, as you shall perceyue hereafter, by his vntrue doynges, whiche brought him to confusion.

Sir Thomas Moore made Chancelour.

The .xxiij. day of October, the king came to his manor of Grenewich, and there muche consulted with his Counsaile, for a meete man to be his Chauncelor, so that in no wyse he were no man of the spiritualtie, and so after long debate, the king resolued himselfe vpon sir Thomas Moore knight, Chauncelor of the Duchie of Lancaster, a man well learned in the tongues, and also in the common Lawe, whose witte was fine, and full of imaginations, by reason wherof, he was to much geuen to mocking, which was to his grauitie a great blemish. And then on the Sunday the .xxiij. day of the same moneth, the king made him his Chauncelour, and delyuered him the great Seale, which Lorde Chauncelour the nexte morrowe after, was ledde into the Chauncerye, by the two Dukes of Norffolk and Suffolk, and there swore, and then the Mace was borne before him

A Parliament.

Thys yere the king of Englande began his high Court of parliament, the thirde day of Nouember. On which day he came by water to his place of Bridewell, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parliament, and so came to the blacke Friers Church, where a Masse of the holye ghost was solemply song by the kinges Chapell, & after the Masse, the king, with all the Lords of the parliament, and commons which were sommoned to appere at that day came into the parliament chamber, where the king sat in hys Throne or seat royall, and syr Thomas Moore his Chauncelour standing ding on the right hande of the king behinde the barre made an eloquent oration, declaring that like as a good Shepheard, which not alonely keepeth and attendeth well his sheepe, but also foreseeth and prouideth for all thing, which eyther may be hurtfull or noysome to his flock, or maye preserue and defende the same agaynst all perilles that may chaunce to come, so the king which was the Shepheard, ruler, and gouernour of his realme, bigilantly foreseing things to come, cõsidered how diuers lawes before this time were made now by long continuaunce of time and mutation of thinges, verie insufficient, and vnperfite, and also by the frayle condition of man, diuers new enormities were sprong amongs the people, for the which no lawe was yet made to reforme the same, which was the very cause why at that time the king had sommoned his high Court of Parliament: and he resembled the king to a Shepheard, or Heardman for this cause, for if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a riche man, if a prince be compared to hys honour, he is but an honorable man: but compare him to the multitude of hys people and the number of his flocke, then he is a ruler, a gouernour of might and puyssaunce, so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of sheepe, commeth the name of a Shepherd: as you see that amongst a great flock of sheepe some be rotten and fautie, which the good Shepheard sendeth from the good sheepe, so the great weather which is of late fallen as you all know, so craftely, so scabbedly, ye & so vntruly iuggeled with the king, that all men must needes gesse and thinke that he thought in himselfe, that he had no wit to perceiue his crafty doing, or else that he presumed that the king would not see nor know his fraudulent iuggeling and attemptes: but he was deceiued, for his graces sight was so quick and penetrable, that he sawe him, yea and sawe through him, both within and without, so that all thing to him was open, and according to his desert he hath had a gentle correction, which small punishment the king will not to be an example to other offendors, but clerely declareth that whosoeuer hereafter shall make like attempt or cõmit like offence, shal not escape with like punishmẽt. And because you of the common house be a great multitude, and cannot speake all at one time: Therefore the kings pleasure is, that you shall resort to the nether house, and there amongst your selues according to the olde and auncient custome to chose an able person to be your common mouth and speaker, and after your election so made to aduertise his grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleasure what daye he will haue him presented in this place.

In ozation made by syr Thomas Moore.

After this done, the commons resorted to the nether house, and they chose for their speaker Thomas Audeley Esquire and attorney of the Duchie of Lancaster, and the same day was the Parliament adiourned to Westminster. On the .vj. day of the same month the king came into the parliament chamber and all the Lordes in there robes, and there the commons of the nether house presented their speaker, which there made an eloquent oration whiche consisted in two poyntes, the first was, that he muche praysed the king for his equitie and Justice, mixed with mercy and pitty, so that none offence was forgotten and left vnpunished, nor in the punishment the extre-mitie nor the rigor of the lawe not cruelly extended, which should be a cause to bridle all men from doyng lyke offences, and also a comfort to offendors to confesse there crime and offence, and an occasion of amendment and reconciliation.

Thomas Audeley chosen speaker.

In Oration.

conciliation.

The ſecond poynt was, that he diſabled himſelfe, for lack of wyt, learnyng and diſcretion to ſo highe an office, beſeeching the king to cauſe his commons to reſort eftſones to their common houſe, and there to chooſe an other ſpeaker for that parliament.

To this the king (by the mouth of the Lorde Chauncelour) aunſwered that where he had diſabled himſelfe in wyt and learning, his awne ornate oration there made, teſtified the contrarie, and as touchyng his diſcretion and other qualities, the king himſelfe had well knowne him and his doyngs, ſith he was in his ſeruice, to be both wiſe and diſcreete, and ſo for an hable man he accepted him, and for the ſpeaker he him admitted.

When the commons were aſſembled in the nether houſe, they began to common of their grieſes, wherewith the ſpiritualtie had before time grieuouſly oppreſſed them, both contrarie to the lawe of the realme, and contrarie to all right, and in eſpeciall they were ſore moued with ſixe great cauſes.

The great charge of the probate of ſir William Comptons Teſtament.

1 The firſt for the exceſſe fynes, which the ordinaries tooke for probate of Teſtaments, inſomuch that ſyr Henry Guilford knight of the Garter and Comptroller of the kings houſe, declared in the open Parliament on his fidelitie that he and other, being executors to Sir William Compton knight, payde for the probate of his will to the Cardinall and the Archebyſhop of Caunterburie a thouſand Marke ſterling: after this declaration were ſhewed ſo manye extortions done by ordinaries for probates of willes, that it were to much to rehearſe.

2 The ſecond cauſe was the great polling and extreme exactiõ, which the ſpirituall men vſed in taking of corps, preſentes, or mortuaries, for the childzen of the defunct ſhould all die for hunger and go a beggyng, rather then they would of charitie gene to them the fielp cow which the dead man ought if he had but onely one, ſuch was the charitie then.

3 The thirde cauſe was, that prieſtes beyng ſurueiors, ſtuardes and officers to Byſhoppes, Abbotes, and other ſpirituall heades, had and occupyed Fermes, Graunges, and graſing in euery countrey, ſo that the poore husbandmen could haue nothing but of them, and yet for that they ſhoulde paye derely.

4 The fourth cauſe was that Abbottes, Priors, and ſpirituall men kept Tanne houſes, and bought and ſolde Woll, clothe, and all maner of Marchaundiſe, as other temporall Marchaunts did.

5 The fift cauſe was becauſe that ſpirituall perſons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their lyuing of their flock, were lyyng in the Court in Lordes houſes, and tooke all of the pariſhoners, and nothing ſpent on them at all, ſo that for lack of reſidence both the pore of the pariſhe lacked refreſhyng, and vniuerſally all the pariſhoners lacked preaching, and true inſtruction of Gods worde, to the great perill of their ſoules.

6 The ſixt cauſe was to ſee one prieſt beyng little learned to haue ten or twelue benefices and to be reſident on none, and to knowe many well learned ſcholers in the Vniuerſitie, which were hable to preache and teache, to haue neyther benefice nor exhibition.

Theſe things before this time might in no wiſe be touched nor yet talked of by no man except he would be made an heretike, or leſe al that he had

for

for the Bysshoppes were Chauncelors, and had all the rule about the king, so that no man durst once presume to attempt anye thing contrarie to their profite or commoditie.

But now when God had illumined the eyes of the king, and that their subtill doings was once espied: then men began charitably to desire a reformation, and so at this parliament men began to shewe their grudges.

Wherevpon the Burgesses of the parliament appointed suche as were learned in the law, beyng of the common house, to drawe one bill of the probates of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, and the thirde for none residence, pluralities, and taking of Fermes by spirituall men.

The learned men tooke much payne, and first set foorth the bill of Mortuaries, which passed the common house, and was sent vp to the Lordes.

To thys bill, the spirituall Lordes made a fayre face, saiyng that surely Priestes and Curates tooke more then they should, and therefore it were well done to take some reasonable order, thus they spake because it touched them little.

But within two dayes after was sent vp the Bill concerning probates of Testaments, at the which the Archebishop of Cauntorburie in especiall, and all other Bysshops in generall both frowned and gruntyd, for that touched there profite, insomuch as Doctor John Fisher Bysshop of Rochester, sayde openly in the parliament chamber these wordes: my Lordes, you see daylie what billes come hether from the common house, and all is to the destruction of the Church, for Gods sake see what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was, and when the Church went downe, then fell the glory of the kingdome, now with the commons is nothing but downe with the Church, and all this me seemeth is for lacke of fayth onely.

When these words were reported to the commons of the nether house, that the Bysshop should say that all their doyngs were for lack of fayth, they tooke the matter grieuously, for they imagyned that the Bysshop esteemed them as heretikes, and so by hys slaunderous wordes would haue perswaded the temporall Lordes to haue restrayned their consent from the sayde two billes, which they before had passed, as you haue heard before.

Wherefore the commons after long debate, determined to sende the speaker of the parliament to the kings highnesse, with a grieuous complaint agaynst the Bysshop of Rochester, and so on a day when the king was at leysure, Thomas Audeley the speaker for the commons and thirtie of the chiefe of the common house, came to the kings presence in his palace at Westminster, which before was called Yorke place and there verie eloquently declared what a dishonour to the king and the realme it was to saye that they which were elected for the wysest men of all the Shires, Cities, and Boroughes within the realme of Englande should be declared in so noble and open presence to lack fayth, which was equiualent to say, that they were infidels and no christians, as yll as Turkes or Sarasins, so that what payne or studie soeuer they toke for the common wealth, or what actes or lawes soeuer they made or stablished, should be taken as lawes made by Panyms and heathen people, and not worthy to be kept by christian men: wherefore he most humbly besought the kings highnesse, to call the sayde Bysshop before hym and to cause him to speake more discretly of such a number as was in the common house.

The king was not well contented with the saiyng of the Bishop, yet he gently aunswered the speaker, that he would sende for the Bishop and send them worde what aunswere he made, and so they departed againe. After this the king sent for the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and six other Bishops and for the Bishop of Rochester also, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons, to the which the Bishop aunswered that he ment the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of fayth, and not the doyngs of them that were in the common house, which saiyng was confirmed by the Bishops being present, which had him in great reputation, and so by that onely saiyng the king accepted his excuse, and therefore sent worde to the commons by syr William Fitzwilliam knight Treasorer of his housholde, which blind excuse pleased the commons nothing at all.

The bishops excuse.

Probate of Testaments.

After this diuers assembles were kept betweene certain of the Lords and certayne of the commons, for the billes of probates of Testamentes, and the mortuaries: the temporaltie layd to the spirituaity there owne lawes and constitutions, and the Spiritualtie sore defended them by prescription and vsage, to whome an aunswere was made by a Gentleman of Greyes Inne: the vsage hath euer bene of theues to rob on Shooters hyll, ergo is it lawfull? with this aunswere the spirituall men were sore offended, because there doynges were called robberies, but the Temporall men stoode still by there saiynges, in so much the sayde Gentleman sayd to the Archebishop of Cantorbury, that both the exaction of probates of Testamentes, and the taking of Mortuaries, as they were vsed, were open robbery and theft: after long disputation, the Temporall Lords began to leane to the commons, but for all that, the bylles remayned vnconcluded a while.

The loane released.

In the meane season there was a byll assented by the Lordes, and sent downe to the commons, the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the sayde acte, dyd release to the king, all such sommes of money as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the fiftene yere of his reigne (as you haue heard before) this byll was sore argued in the common house, but the most parte of the Commons were the kinges seruauntes, and the other were so labored to by other, that the byll was assented to.

When this release of the loane was knowne to the Commons of the Realme, Lorde so they grudged, and spake yll of the whole Parlyament, for almost euery man counted it hys dette, and recomed suerly of the payment of the same, and therefore some made there wylles of the same, and some other did set it ouer to other for debte, and so manye men had losse by it, which caused them sore to murmur, but there was no remedy. The king like a good and discrete Prince, seyng that his commons in the parliament house had released the loane, entending somwhat to requite the same, graunted to them a generall Pardon, of all offences, certayne great offences and debtes onely except: also he ayded them for the redresse of their grieues against the Spiritualty, and caused two new bylles to be made indifferently both for the probate of Testaments & Mortuaries, which billes were so reasonable that the Spirituall Lords assented to them although they were sore against their minds, and in especiall the probate of Testaments sore displeased the Bishops, & the Mortuaryes sore displeased the Persones & Vicars.

After

After these actes thus agreed, the Commons, made another acte for pluralities, of benefices none residence, byeng and sellyng, and taking of fermes by Spirituall persons, which act so displeased the Spiritualty that the Prieste rayled on the Commons of the common house, and called them heretikes and Scismatikes, for the which diuerse Prists were punished.

This acte was sore debated aboue in the parliament chamber, and the Lordes spirituall would in no wise consent. Wherfore the king perceyuing the grudge of his Commons, caused eyght Lordes and eyght of his Commons to meete in the Starre Chamber at an after none, and there was sore debating of the cause, insomuche that the Temporall Lordes of the vpper house, which were there, tooke part with the Commons, against the Spirituall Lordes, and by force of reason caused them to assent to the byll with a litle qualifiyng, which byll the next day was wholy agreed to in the Lordes house, to the great reioysing of the lay people, and to the great displeasure of the spirituall persons.

During this parliament was brought downe to the commons, the boke of articles which the Lordes had put to the king agaynst the Cardinall, the chiefe articles were these.

Articles presented against Cardinal Wolsey.

First that he without the kings assent had procured to be a Legate, by reason whereof he toke away the right of all Bishops and spiritual persons.

Item, in all writyngs which he wrote to Rome, or any other forreyne Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my king, as who would saye that the king were his seruaunt.

Item, that he hath slaundered the Church of Englande in the Court of Rome, for his suggestion to be a Legat, was to reforme the Church of Englande, which as he wrote was Facta in reprobum censum.

Item, he without the kinges assent, caried the kinges great Seale with him into Flaunders, when he was sent Ambassade to the Emperor.

Item, he without the kinges assent, sent a Commission to sir Gregory de Cassado, knight, to conclude a league betwene the king & the Duke of Farrare, without the kinges knowlege.

Item that he hauyng the Frenche Pockes, presumed to come and breth on the king.

Item, that he caused the Cardinals hat to be put on the kinges coyne.

Item, that he would not suffer the kinges Clarke of the Market, to sit at Saint Albones.

Item, that he had sent innumerable substaunce to Rome, for the obteynyng of his dignities to the great empouerishment of the realme.

These Articles with many more, were read in the common house, & signed with the Cardinals hand, and was confessed by him: And also there was shewed a writyng sealed with his Seale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and vnmoueables.

On the day of the conception of our Lady before Christmasse, the king at Yorke place at Westminster, in the Parliament tyme, created the Vicount Rochford Erle of Wilshire, and the Vicount Fitzwater, was created Erle of Sussex, and the Lord Hastynges, was created Erle of Huntyngton.

When all things were concluded in the Parliament house, the king came to the Parliament Chamber the.xvij. daye of December, and there gaue his royall assent, to all thinges done by the Lordes, and Commons, and so proroged his Court of Parliament, till the next yere.

After the Parliament was thus ended, the king remoued to Grenewich and there kept his Christmasse with the Queene in great triumph: with great plentie of Uiandes, and diuers disguysyngs and Enterludes, to the great reioysing of his people.

The king of England beyng aduertised that the Emperor and the Bishop of Rome were together at Bononie, determined to sende thether a solempne Ambassade, both to declare to them the lawe of God, and the determination of the vniuersities, and also to require the Bishop of Rome to doe iustice according to the truth, and also to shewe to the Emperor that the king did not moue thys matter for any displeasure that he bare to hym or the Queene his Aunt, but onely for the discharge of his conscience, and for the quietnesse of his realme.

When this purpose was agreed by the kinges counsaile, the king appoynted sir Thomas Bulleyne late created Erle of Wilshire, and Doctor Stokesley elected Bishop of London, and Doctor Edward Lee, his Almoner, two great Clarkes, for his Ambassadors, and with them he sent diuers Doctors both of the law and diuinitie. These Ambassadors made great preparation, & about the beginnyng of Februry they set forward, and so much they trauailed, that they came to Sauoy where the Duke in the fayre towne of Cambrey, caused them honourably to be receyued and feasted.

So they passed the Mountaynes, and so through the Duchye of Millain, and by long iourneyes they came to Bononie in Lent, where they were honourably receyued by the Maister of the Emperours house, and diuers Lordes and Gentlemen belongyng to the Pope, and within short space the sayd Ambassadors were first conueyed to the Pope, and there declared their message, and shewed the determination of the great Doctors, and famous Uniuersities. Pope Clement which was a man of no learning, but of a great wit, made to them a gentle answere, and sayde that he would heere the matter disputed when he came to Rome, and according to right he would doe iustice. But his intent was all contrary, for he knewe well that if he should geue sentence, that Pope July could not dispence with the breche of Goddes lawe, that then the authoritie of the Court of Rome would little be regarded, and also he feared the Emperors displeasure, if he should geue sentence agaynst his aunte, so that for feare of losyng authoritie, and of the Emperors displeasure, Bishop Clement durst not iudge according to Gods lawe. After they had bene with the Pope, they came to the Emperor, which them gently receyued, and after they had done their message, he answered them, that he in no wise would be agaynst the law of God, and if the court of Rome would adiudge that the matrimonie were not good, he would be content, but he thought all otherwise, for he solicited the Pope and all the Cardinalles which were his frendes to stande by the dispensation, which he iudged to be as strong as Gods lawe. After this answere they tooke their leaue of the Emperor, which the next weeke after departed out of Bononie towarde Almaine in good order of battaile, he himselfe in gilt harnesse, and his Nobles in white harnesse, with rich coates and trappers very curiously beseene.

The Popes answere.

After that the Emperor was gone out of Bononie, the Ambassadors of of England tooke their leaue of the Bishop of Rome, which went towarde Rome againe, and returned toward England, through the Duchie of Myllain, which were receyued by the Erle Lodouicke, great Counsaylor to the Duke of Millayn, which Erle conducted them through the whole Duchie of Millain, and payed all their charges by the Dukes commaundement. And when these Ambassadors were passed the Mountaynes, they receyued letters from the king, which appoynted the Erle of Wilshire to go Ambassade to the French king, which then lay at Burdeaux making prouision for money for the redemyng of his children: and the Bishop of London was appoynted to go to Padua, and other Universities in Italy to knowe their opinions in the kings case, and the kings Almoner was appoynted to returne into England, and so he did, thus was the ende of this Ambassade.

You haue heard before, howe the Cardinall was attainted in the Premunire, and howe he was put out of the office of the Chauncelor, and lay at Asher: In this Lent season the king by the aduise of his Counsaile licenced him to go into his Diocesse of Yorke, and gaue him commaundement to kepe him in his Diocesse, and not to returne Southward without the kinges speciall licence in writyng.

So he made great prouision to go Northward, and apparailed his seruauntes newly, and bought many costly thinges for his housholde, and so he might well ynough, for he had of the kinges gentlenesse the Bishoprikes of Yorke, and Winchester, which were no small thinges, but at this tyme dyuers of his seruauntes departed from him to the kinges seruice, and in especiall Thomas Crumwell one of hys chiefe Counsaile, and chiefe doer for hym in the suppression of Abbeys. After that all thinges necessary for his iournay were prepared, he tooke hys iournay northwarde tyll he came to Southwell, which is in his Diocesse, and there he continued this yere, euer grudging at his fall as you shall heere after: but the landes which he had geuen to his Colleges in Oxford, and Ipswich, were nowe come to the kinges handes, by his attainder in the Premunire, and yet the king of his gentlenesse, and for fauour that he bare to good learnyng, erected again the College in Oxford, and where it was named the Cardinalles College, he called it the kinges College, and endewed it with fayre possessions, and put in new statutes and ordinaunces, and for because the College of Ipswiche was thought to be nothing profitable, therfore he caused that to be dissolued.

Thomas Crumwel came into the kings seruice.

The last Sommer while the peace was treated at Cambray, as you haue heard before, Ferdinando brother to the Emperour, recouered certaine townes which the Turkes had taken from him in Hungry, and put to flight his enemy John de Uainoda, which falsly named himselfe king of Hungary. This Uainoda destitute of all succours fled to Sultan Solimán the great Turke, desiryng him of succour, to recouer Hungary agayne. The Turke beyng glad to haue an occasion to destroy Hungary, assembled a puyssaunt army, and entered into Hungary, and made proclamation, that what towne or Citie would not obey king John as their king, should be put to fyre and sworde. This proclamation feared the Hungarians, that all in maner yelded themselues subiects to the Uainoda, the Citie of Bude onely except: which at the last was yelded by composition, that they should depart with bag and baggage, but for all their safeconduite signed with the great Turkes hande, they were firſt robbed of the Janizers, and after that ſhamefully ſlaine.

Crueltie of the Turkes.

When the Turke had this Bude in poſſeſſion, he left there the Vainoda and Lewys great Baſtard ſonne to the Duke of Uenice, with fiue thouſand footemen, and two thouſand horſemen, and he with all haſt entered into Auſtrice, where his people committed ſuch crueltie and tiranny, as neuer hath bene heard nor written, for of ſome they put out the eyes, of other they cut of the noſes and eares, of other they cut off the priuie members, of women they cut off the Pappes, and rauiſhed Uirgins, and of women great with childe, they cut their bellies and brent the children: Beſide this, as they paſſed they brent corne, trees, houſes, and all that would be brent, to make the Countrie deſolate, and at the laſt the. xxij. day of September, the Turkes armie came nie to Uienne, a riche and a famous Citie in Auſtrice. The fame was, that he had two hundred and fiftie thouſand men in his army, and. xxv. thouſand Tentes in the ſight of the Citie.

And foraſmuch as here is a good occaſion geuen ſomewhat to ſpeake of the vile tiranny of the Turkes, and namely for that I haue heard diuers ſay (but I truſt they did not ſo inwardly think, as they outwardly ſpake) that it were no great matter if the great Turke were prince of all Chriſtendome, for we ſhould liue vnder him in a better and quyeter ſtate of life then we do now, into the which error God forbid that any Chriſtian perſon ſhoulde be caried: Therfore the better to expreſſe the mõſterous tyranny of the Turke, I haue here thought meete to ſhew the wordes of Sebaſtian Munſter as he expreſſeth the ſame in his learned booke of Coſmography.

Sebaſtian Munſter deſcribeth the Turkes tirannie.

When (ſayth he) the Turke goeth to warre, he hath alwayes with him a great troupe of people called Marcquynyons, which are byars and ſellers of ſuch priſoners as ſhall fortune to be taken, whome they call Sclaues and bondemen: And alſo there goeth with them a great number of Swordplaiers and Maiſters of Fence. And in hope to haue ſome Sclaues, they do cary with them a great number of cheynes, ſhakles, boltes and couples of Iron, and amonge their cheynes ſome are of ſuch length that they may cary fiftie or three ſcore perſones in one cheyne, and one Uilleyn ſhall haue the leading of ſo many.

Marquinion is a byar and ſellor of Chriſtian priſoners, whome they call Sclaues.

Biyng and ſellyng of priſoners and Bondmen is a great merchandiſe in Turquy.

Theſe pylferers, I meane the Marcquynions and Swordplayers ſo ſone as any number of priſoners be taken, they ſell and make marchandiſe of them, as they may lawfully do by their law, vpon this condicion that they ſhal pay vnto the Turke the tenth priſoner or Sclaue, and the reſt they may retayne to their vſe and commoditie. They haue no marchaundyſe among them that is of greater trade, nor of greater gayne, then the biyng and ſelling of Sclaues and bondmen. And ſuch priſoners as commeth into the Turkes handes, be they males or females he vſeth them after this ſorte, he ſelleth the aged and rude vnto houſbandmen, and the yong boyes he committeth vnto diuers ſchooles to be taught in ſome artes or craftes, and the yong wenches he ſendeth alſo into certayne places to be taught to ſow and knyt, and ſuch other exerciſes, to the entent that afterward they may ſerue in the common weale more commodiouſly. And firſt he cauſeth them all to deny their fayth and then to be circumciſed: and then are they trayned vp in their ceremonies vnto the which by nature they are ſone drawne, & after he cauſeth them to vnderſtand the lawes of ỹ land. And if there be in them any strength of body and corage of minde, then he causeth them to be sent to the warres and calleth them Janizaries that is deniers of the faith. And if they haue no quicke spirite and yet mightie of bodye, then they are brought vp and exercised in shootyng, and haue schoolemaisters appointed to make them excellent therein, and they are forced to render an accompt of their exercise with great extremitie, for those which hit not the white, haue so many tymes as they misse, so many lashes with a whip, and some they bring vp in swordе playing, and in the exercise of other weapons.

The mayden children that are any thing beautifull are taken to be their Concubynes and Harlots, or at the least to wayte and attend vpon them, to whome they commit most lothsome and filthie businesse, such as to heare the same named would abhorre any honest good eare. The cruell vsage of Mayden children.

When they haue newe slaues, they begin with terrible punishmentes, and afterwardes with grieuous threatnings, and if that preuayle not, then they vse gentle wordes and fayre promises to procure them to be circumcised. And as soone as they bring that to passe, then they vse them with much more gentlenesse. And if any attempt to escape, the payne of fyre is ordeyned for him. They doe licence the slaues wyllingly to mary, but the children that they bring forth are solde at the discretion of the maister, wherefore the wise and sage be well aduised before they marry. The Turkes practise all meanes to wynne the Christians to be circumcised.

They doe cruelly intreat those that will not be circumcised. The estate of them which haue no handie crafties is verey euill, for they shall learne nothing there (except they be circumcised) wherefore the priestes and such as are studentes, and the Gentlemen which haue bene brought vp without occupations, are in the worst state of all other when they happen into their handes: For the Marcquinion will lay out nothing for them, nor dispend anye thing vpon them, because when he should sell them, he knoweth not who wyll geue any thing for them. These are caryed barehedded, barefooted and almost all naked. They drawe them through the frostes, snowes and other the rockes and Mountaynes, both in heate and colde, and they haue neuer rest vntill they die, or else that they chaunce vpon an vnhappie maister. There is none so blessed nor fortunate of what estate, age, bewtie or arte soeuer he or they be of, that may be suffered to go into a lodging, if he chaunce to fall sick by the high wayes side. And if any be sick, they force him to go on foote, and if he can not, they set him vpon an euill fauoured Jade: And if he cannot ryde nor holde fast, then they binde him ouerthwart the horse lyke a Male behinde a Saddle. And if he die, then such clothes as he hath vpon him, they pull off and throwe him into the next diche. But to go forward, they doe not onely lead them captiues and prisoners in cheynes (as is afore sayde) but also they manacle their handes with suche long Boltes as keepeth the one of them from the other a whole yard space, for feare that one of them should fight with another, and also for feare least they should throwe stones at their keepers. And when night draweth on, then also they fetter their legges and turne them vpside downe, so that they lye openly in the fieldes gaping into the ayre, and there must rest to abide what weather soeuer commeth. Priestes and Gentlemen are euill intreated of the Turkes. O cruell and vncharitable Turkes.

The entertaynment of the women is somewhat more gentle: they that are strong, marche afore on fote (but not vnmanacled) and suche as are but tender Vnkyndly and moste shamefull en-tender and weake, they set them on horses: And if they be not able to abide the shaking of the horse, they put them into Baskets, and carie them as men carie quick wildfoule: But the night is most grieuous vnto them. For when they are shut vp in close places, they are compelled to suffer the filthie company of the Marequinions, most beastly to abuse them, for all the night long is heard among them most pittifull cryes and lamentations made by the yong persons as well Males as Females, whome they most wickedly enforce and filthily order, yea they are so vylanous that they spare not their awne little children of fiue or seuen yere of age, so wicked, vyle and prone is that nation vnto that abhominable sinne agaynst nature.

The Turks are most filthy Sodomites.

Allone as daye light commeth, then must they marche forwarde lyke droues of beastes or sheepe, and to the Market they go. The Marchaunts come together and agree vpon a price: But before the Marchaunt paye his money: the slaue shall be striped starke naked that hys maister may see hun, and then he beholdeth all hys members, and gropeth and feeleth all hys ioynts, to see if there be any fault or maine in hym. If the Marchant doe not lyke hym, then is he returned agayne vnto the charge of the Marequinion. And thus shall he be alwaies vsed vntil such time as a Marchaunt bieth him outright. And when the byer hath bought him, he maye at his pleasure put him to what slauery or grieuous labour he himselfe lust, be it neuer so vyle, and also to vse suche punishment of him, as putting on fetters or collers of yron, and whipping naked with roddes made of Wyers or any other cruell punishment that he can deuyse, not forceing though he die thereof. If any chaunce to be taken with their wiues and family, those the great Lordes doe willingly bie to put them into their deryes, & to haue the ouersight of their groundes, their Vynes and their Pastures, but the children that are borne of them are bond.

The poore Christians are led like beasts to be solde in the Market.

Shamefull Turkes.

Tirannous Turkes.

And finally, when the Turke hath taken any Prouince of christendome as he hath done to many (if almightie God had bene pleased to the contrary) all the goods of the inhabitaunts, as well moueable as immoueable are his praye and share. And first of all he rooteth out and destroyeth all noble personages, and namely suche as are of the bloud royall. And if he kyll not the Ecclesiasticall ministers, he taketh from them both their goodes and honors and lyuinges, and leaueth them to the wonderment of the worlde, to goe a beggyng.

The Turke is bloudy and vnmercifull.

Sermons and preachyng of the Gospell of Christ is vtterly forbidden through all Turky: neither shal it be lawfull for any christian man to beare any office in Turky: Neyther to carie any armes, nor to go appareled lyke a Turke. If any doe raple or outrage at a christian man, or at Jesu Christ, he must be content and holde his peace. And if any chaunce to talke or common any thing agaynst their religion, the same shall be circumcised in spight of his heart. And if any open their mouth to speake agaynst Mahomet, the same shall be brent quick. The christians doe paye the fourth part of all their fruites, not onely for the rent of their landes, but also for the gayne and profite that they receiue of their handie craftes and occupations. Besides thys, they pay another imposition, which is set vpon them by the polle, for so many heades as euery christian hath in his house, so many Ducates he shall pay yere ly vnto the Turke. If the parents be not able to paye it, then will they take take away the children, and sell them to pay that money, and so bring them into seruitude and bondage. The other number that are fast in Chaynes they go from house to house begging their almose, and if by that meanes they cannot get where withall to pape, then are they put in perpetuall prison, and neuer more suffered to come abroade. And thus much wryteth Munster of the tyranny of the Turkes.

At the beginning of the siege, the Turke sent certaine to the Lordes of the towne, and willed them to yelde the towne vnto him, and they should depart with bagge and baggage, and if they would kepe it by force, he would surely haue it and put them all to the sworde. Now in the Citie was Capitaine Duke Philip of Bauier, Erle Palatine of the Rine, and nephew to the Palsegraue elector, a young man of Noble courage, and with him were twelue thousand Almaynes, and two thousande horsemen, which nothing feared the Turkes threatnynges. The Turke perceiuyng their boldenesse, bent his great ordinaunce, which were three hundreth peeces against the walles, and cõmaunded the towne to be assaulted: the Turkes gaue a great assault, but the Christen men valiauntly defended them, so that the Turkes were compelled to flie, and many of them were slaine.

The fourth day of October, the Turke bent all his ordinaunce against the wall, which so shooke the wall, that all men within supposed that the walles would haue fallen downe, but they did little harme, which was soone amended. The first day of October. viij. thousand christen men issued out of the towne, and came where the Turkes Miners were worknyng, and slue a great number and destroyed the mynes. The same day the Turkes gaue a great assault to the Citie: the Christen men valiauntly them defended, and threw downe great loggs, and barres of yron, and slue many Turkes. Thus the Turkes assaulted the Citie a leuen tymes, and so many times they were beaten away, but the great and terrible assault was the. xij. day of October, at the which assault the christen men so valiauntly defended themselues, and slue and hurt so many of the Turkes, that after that day for no commaundement that the Turke could geue, they would no more geue assault.

The Turke perceyued well both the strength of the Citie, and the courage of the Capitaynes within, and also the Winter there was muche more colder then in his countries, which sore troubled him & his people, wherefore he called his Counsaile, and concluded to breake vp his siege and to depart, and so the. xiiij. day of October he shot great stones into the Citie all day till night: and about ten of the clocke in the night he caused his tentes to be taken vp, and set fyre on the straw, and such other stuffe, and so remoued all his armie, towarde Bude, sauyng fiftie thousand horsemen which taried all the next day behinde, carryng with him a great number of Christian prisoners, which he put to the Mynes, and such other vile seruice. At this siege the Turke lost by murder, sicken esse, and colde, aboue. lxxx. thousand men, as one of his Ballades did after warde confesse.

The number of the turkes that died.

Thus was the Citie of Vienne defended agaynst the great Turke, and al his power, which was to him a great displeasure, and in especially because he neuer besieged Citie before, but eyther it was yelded, or taken.

In this yere, the wilde Irishemen knowyng the Erle of Kildare to be in Englande, entered his lande, and spoyled and brent his Countrie, and diuers other Countries, and the Erle of Ossery beyng the kinges Deputie, made little resistaunce, for lacke of power, wherefore the king sent the Erle of Kildare into Ireland, and with him Sir William Skeuyngton knight, Mayster of the kinges ordinaunce, and diuers Gunners with him, which so politikely ordred themselues, that their enemies were glad to offer amends and to treate for truce, & so sir William Skeuyngton the next yere returned into England leauyng there the Erle of Kildare for the kinges deputie.

The Emperour as you haue heard the last yere, passed out of Italy into Germany and was receyued with great honor and triumph into the City of Ausborough or Auguste, where in June were present all the electors and almost all the Princes of the Empire: there was kept a great counsaile, for the Princes of Germanie were of two seuerall opinyons, and of seuerall names, the part that fauored the Pope and all thinges done by his authority were called Catholicall, and the other part which folowed and preached onely the Gospell of Christ were called Euangelicall. Of these and other thinges concerning our fayth there were many counsayles: but Cardynall Campeius the Popes Legat woulde not suffer the Euangelicall persons (whom he called Lutherans) to argue against the Catholicall men (whome the Euangelicall persons called Papistes) least by opening of the scripture the auctority of the Court of Rome should haue bene damned, and therfore the Emperor put of the matter till another time: But this matter was not so let slippe, for of this motion men so serched the law of God that within a few yeres after, many people refused the Pope for the head of the Churche and forsooke him and his pardons.

Proclamation.

On the. xix. day of September in the Citie of London was made this proclamation. The kings highnesse straightly chargeth and commaundeth that no manner of person of what estate, degre or condition soeuer he or they be of, do purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or elsewhere, nor vse and put in execution, diuulge, or publish any thing heretofore within this yere passed, purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, containing matter preiudiciall to the high auctoritie, iurisdiction and prerogatiue royall, of this his sayd realme, or to the let, hynderaunce or impechment of his graces noble and vertuous entended purposes in the premisses, vppon paine of incurring his highnesse indignation and imprisonment and farther punishment of their bodies for their so doing at his graces pleasure, to the dredfull example of all other.

This proclamation was much mused at, and euery worde of the same well noted. Some sayd that it was because that the Queene had purchased a new Bull for the ratification of her mariage, other saide that it was made because the Cardinall had purchased a Bull to curse the king, if he woulde not restore him to his olde dignities, and that the king should suffer him to correct the spiritualtie and he not to meddle with the same. This inuencion sounded most to the truth as you shall here afterward.

In October the riuer of Tiber was of such an heigth that in Rome and other places about Rome almost twelue thousand persons were drowned, and in the next moneth Zelande, Hollande and Brabant were sore noyed with waters, and many people and much catteil were drowned.

The Citie of Rome, and Zeland, Holland & Brabant ouerflowen with great waters

You haue heard in the last yere, howe the Cardinall of Yorke was attainted in the Premunire, and that notwithstandyng the king had geuen him the Bishoprikes of Yorke and Winchester, with great plentie of substaunce, and had licenced him to lie in his Dioces of Yorke. He being thus in his Dioces grudgyng at his fall, and not remembryng the kinges kindnesse shewed to him, wrote to the Court of Rome, and diuers other Princes letters in reproche of the king, and in almuch as in him lay, he stirred them to reuenge his cause against the king and his realme, insomuch that diuers opprobrious wordes of the king, was spoken to Doctor Edward Kerne the kinges Orator at Rome, and it was sayde to him that for the Cardinalles sake, the king should haue the worse speede in the suite of his matrimonie. The Cardinall also would speake fayre to the people to winne their heartes, and declared euer that he was vniustly, and vntruely ordered, which fayre speakyng made many men beleue that he sayd true, and to Gentlemen he gaue great giftes to allure them vnto him. And to be had in the more reputacion among the people, he determined to be installed or inthronised at Yorke, with all the pompe that might be, & caused a trone to be erected in the Cathedrall Church in suche an heigth and fashion as was neuer sene, and sent to all the Lordes, Abbottes, Priors, knightes, Esquiers, and Gentlemen of his Dioces, to be at his manor of Cawod the sixt day of November, and so to bring him to Yorke with all maner of pompe and solemnitie.

The king which knewe his doynges and priuie conueyaunce, all this yere dissimuled the matter to see what he would do at length, till that he sawe his prowde heart so high exalted, that he would be so triumphantly installed, without making the king priuie, yea and in maner in disdaine of the king, thought it not meete nor conuenient to suffer him any lenger to continue in his malicious and prowde purposes and attemptes: wherefore he directed his letters to Henry the sixt Erle of Northumberland, willyng him wyth all diligence to arrest the Cardinall, and to deliuer him to the Erle of Shrewsbury great steward of the kinges housholde: When the Erle had seene the letter, he with a conuenient number came to the Manor of Cawod, the fourth day of November, and when he was brought to the Cardinall in his Chamber, he sayd to him, my Lorde, I pray you take pacience, for here I arrest you. Arrest me sayde the Cardinall, yea sayd the Erle, I haue a commaundement so to do: you haue no such power sayde the Cardinall, for I am both a Cardinall and a Legate de Latere, and a Peere of the College of Rome, and ought not to be arrested by any temporall power, for I am not subiect to that power, wherefore if you arrest me, I will withstand it: well sayde the Erle, here is the kinges Commission (which he shewed him) and therefore I charge you to obey, the Cardinall somewhat remembred himselfe and sayde, well my Lorde, I am content to obey, but although that I by negligence fell into ỹ punishment of the premunire, and lost by the law all my landes and goodes, yet my person was in the kings protection, and I was pardoned that offence, wherefore I maruayle why I nowe should be arrested, arrested, and specially considerynge I am a member of the sea Apostolike, on whom no temporall man ought to lay violent handes: well I see the king lacketh good Counsaile. Well sayde the Erle when I was swoorne Warden of the Marches, you your selfe tolde me, that I might with my staffe arrest all men under the degree of a king, and nowe I am more stronger, for I haue a Commission so to do which you haue seene. The Cardinall at length obeyed, and was kept in his priuie Chamber, and his goodes sealed, and his officers discharged, and his Phisition called Doctor Augustine, was lykewise arrested, and brought to the Tower by sir Walter Welshe, one of the kinges Chamber. The sixt day of Nouember he was conueyed from Cawod to Sheffielde Castell, and there deliuered to the Erle of Shrewsburies keepyng, till the kinges pleasure were knowne: Of this attachement was much commonyng amongest the common people, wherefore manye were glad, for surely he was not in the fauor of the commonaltie.

When the Cardinall was thus arrested, the king sent Syr Wylliam Kyngston knight, Capitayne of the Garde, and Constable of the Tower of London with certaine of the yomen of the Garde to Sheffeld, to fetche the Cardinall to the Tower. When the Cardinall sawe the Capitayne of the Garde, he was sore astonnyed and shortly became sick, for then he perceyued some great trouble towarde him, and for that cause men sayde that he wylyngly tooke so much quantitie of strong purgation that his nature was not hable to beare it: But Syr Wylliam Kyngston comforted him, and by easie iorneys he brought him to the Abbay of Leicester the. xrbij. day of Nouember, where for very feblenesse of nature caused by purgations and vomites he dyed the second night folowing, and in the same Abbay lyeth buryed. This Cardinall as you may perceyue in thys storie was of a great stomack, for he compted himselfe egall with Princes, and by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure: He force litle on Symony and was not pitifull and stood affectionate in his owne opinion: In open presence he would lye and say vntruth, and was double both in speech and meaning: He would promise much and performe little: He was vicious of his body and gaue the clergie euill example: He hated sore the Citie of London and feared it: It was tolde him that he should die in the waye toward London, wherefore he feared least the commons of the Citie would arise in riotous maner and so slay him, yet for all that he dyed in the waye toward London. The authoritie of this Cardinall set the Clergie in such a pride that they disdayned all men, wherefore when he was fallen they folowed after as you shall heare.

The discription of the Cardinall.

After the Cardinall was deade, the king remooued from Hampton Court to Grenewiche, where he wyth Queene Katheryn kept a solempne Christmas, and on the twelfe night he sat in the hall in his estate, where as were diuers Enterludes, riche Maskes and disgoztes, and after that a great Banket. And after Christmasse he came to his Manor of Westmynster, which was called Yorke place, for after that the Cardinall was attaynted in the Premunire and was gone Northwarde, he made a feoffement of the same place to the king, and the Chapiter of the Cathedrall Church of Yorke by their wryting confirmed the same feoffement, and then the king chaunged the name and called it the kings Manor of Westminster and no more Yorke place.

The

The whole Clergie of Englande euer ſuppoꝛted and mayntayned the power Legantyne of the Cardinall, wherefoꝛe the kings counſayle learned ſayde plainely that they were in the Pꝛemunire, the ſpirituall Loꝛdes were called by pꝛoceſſe into the kings Benche to aunſwere, but befoꝛe their daye of apperaunce they in their Conuocation concluded an humble ſubmiſſion in wꝛyting, and offered the king a hundꝛed thouſande pounde to be their good Loꝛde, and alſo to geue them a pardon of all offences touchyng the Pꝛemunire by act of parliament, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon pꝛomiſed. In this ſubmiſſion the Clergie called the king ſupꝛeme head of the Church of Englande, which thing they neuer confeſſed befoꝛe, wherebpon many things folowed after as you ſhall here. The king firſt named ſupꝛeme hed.

When the parliament was begun the firſt day of January, the pardon of the ſpirituall perſons was ſigned with the kinges hande and ſent to the Loꝛdes, which in time conuenient aſſented to the Bill and ſent it to the commons in the lower houſe, and when it was red, dyuers frowarde perſons would in no wiſe aſſent to it, except all men were pardoned, ſayng that all men which had anye thing to doe with the Cardinall were in the ſame caſe: the wyſer ſoꝛt aunſwered that they would not compell the king to geue them his pardon, and beſide that it was vncharitably done of them to hurt the Clergie, and to doe themſelues no good, wherfoꝛe they aduiſed them to conſent to the Bill and after to ſue to the king foꝛ their pardon, which counſaile was not folowed, but they determined firſt to ſende the ſpeaker to the king oꝛ they would aſſent to the Bill, wherebpon Thomas Audely ſpeaker foꝛ the commons with a cõuenient number of the common houſe came to the kings pꝛeſence and there eloquently he declared to the king how the commons ſoꝛe lamented and bewayled their chaunce to thinke oꝛ imagine themſelues to be out of his gracious fauour, becauſe that he had gracioully geuen his pardon of the Pꝛemunire to his ſpirituall ſubiects and not to them, wherefoꝛe they moſt humbly beſought his grace of his accuſtomed goodneſſe and clemency to include them in the ſame pardon.

The king wiſely anſwered that he was their pꝛince and ſouereigne Loꝛd, and that they ought not to reſtraine him of his libertie, noꝛ to compell hym to ſhew his mercy, foꝛ it was at his pleaſure to vſe the extremity of his lawes oꝛ mitigate and pardon the ſame, wherefoꝛe ſithe they denyed to aſſent to the pardon of the ſpirituall perſons, which pardon he ſayde he might geue without their aſſent by his great ſeale, he would be well aduiſed oꝛ he pardoned them, becauſe he would not be noted to be compelled to do it: with this aunſwere the ſpeaker and the commons departed very ſoꝛowfull & penſiue, and ſome light perſons ſayd that Thomas Crumwell which was newly come to the fauoꝛ of the king had diſcloſed the ſecrets of the commons, which thing cauſed the king to be ſo extreme.

The kyng like a good pꝛince conſidered how ſoꝛowfull his Commons were of the aunſwere that he had made them, & thought that they were not quyet, wherefoꝛe of his owne motion he cauſed a pardon of the Pꝛemunire to be dꝛawne, and ſigned it with his hand and ſent it to the common houſe by Chꝛiſtopher Hales his atturnay, which Byll was ſone aſſented to. Then the Commons louingly thanked the king and much pꝛayſed his great wiſedome that he had denied it to them when they vnwoꝛthely demaunded it, and had boũtifully graũted it when he perceyued that they sorowed & lamented.

While the Parliament sate, on the .xxx. day of Marche at after noone there came into the common house the Lord Chauncellor and diuers Lords of the Spiritualtie and Temporaltie to the number of twelue, and there the Lorde Chauncellor sayde, you of this worshipfull house I am sure be not so ignorant but you know well that the kyng our soueraigne Lorde hath maried his brothers wife, for she was both wedded and bedded with his brother prince Arthure, and therefore you may suerly say that he hath maried his brothers wife, if this mariage be good or no many Clerkes do doubte. Wherefore the king like a verteous prince willing to be satisfied in his conscience and also for the suertie of his realme hath with great deliberation consulted with great Clerkes, and hath sent my Lorde of London here present to the chiefe Vniuersities of all Christendome to knowe their opinion and iudgment in that behalfe. And although the Vnyuersities of Cambrige and Oxford had bene sufficient to discusse the cause, yet because they be in his realme and to auoide al suspition of partiality, he hath sent into the realme of Fraunce, Italy the Popes dominions, and Venisians to knowe their iudgment in that behalfe, which haue concluded, written and sealed their determinations according as you shall here red. Then Sir Bryan Tuke tooke out of a box twelue writinges sealed, and read them worde by worde translated out of latin into the English tongue.

After these determinations were read, there were shewed aboue an hundred bokes drawne by Doctors of straunge Regions, which all agreed the kinges Maryage to be vnlawfull, which were not red, for the day was spent. Then the Chauncellor sayd: Now you of thys common house, may reporte in your countries what you haue seene and heard and then all men shall openly perceyue that the king hath not attempted this matter of will or pleasure, as some straungers reporte, but onely for the discharge of hys conscyence and suertie of the succession of his realme: this is the cause of our repayre hether to you, and now we will depart.

When these determinations were published, al wise men in the realme much abhorred that mariage: but women and such as were more wilfull then wise or learned, spake against the determination, and sayde that the Vnyuersyties were corrupt and entysed so to do, which is not to be thought. The king himselfe sore lamented his chaunce and made no manner of mirth nor pastime as he was wont to do, and dined and resorted to the Queene as he was accustomed, and minished nothing of her estate, and much loued and cherished their daughter the Lady Mary: but in no wise he would not come to her bed. When Ester began to draw nere, the parliament for that time ended, and was proroged till the last day of Marche, in the next yere.

The Acte of poysoning.

In the Parliament aforesayde was an act made, that whosoeuer did poyson any person should be boyled in hote water to the death: which act was made bycause one Richard Roose, in the parliament time had poysoned diuers persons at the Bishop of Rochesters place, which Richard, according to the same acte, was boyled in Smythfield the Teneber Wednisday following, to the terrible example of all other.

An Erthquake.

This wynter season, on the .xxvj. day of January, in the Citie of Lysborne in Portingale, was a wonderous Earthquake, which destroyed many houſes and Towers, and ſlew many people by the falling downe of the ſame, the kinges pallace ſhooke ſo, that he and the Queene and the Ladies fled out of their Pallace, without any ſeruauntes, and ſought ſuccor where they might get it, and ſodaynly the quaking ceaſſed: Then the Rockes opened, and out ſprang the water, then the ſhippes in the hauen were like to haue periſhed: Then the Earth quaked againe, and did more harme then before, and at night it ceaſſed: By which Earthquake, many men were murthered and deſtroyed.

When the vniuerſitie aforeſayde, and a great number of clerkes and well learned men had determined the kinges mariage to be vnlawfull, deteſtable, and againſt Godes law, as you haue heard, the king wylling the Queene to haue knowledge of the ſame, ſent to her diuers Lordes of the counſayle the laſt day of Maye being the Wedneſday in whitſon weke: the which Lordes, in her chamber at Greenewiche, declared to her all the determination as you haue heard, and aſked her whether ſhe woulde for the quyetneſſe of the kinges conſcience, put the matter to foure Prelates, and foure Temporall Lords of this realme, or abyde by her appele. The Queene aunſwered: the king my father which concluded my mariage, I am ſure, was not ſo ignorant but he aſked counſayle of clerkes and well learned men before he maried me the ſecond time: for if he had had any doubt in my mariage, he would not haue diſburſed ſo great a treaſure as he did, and then all Doctors in manner agreed my mariage to be good, inſomuch that the Pope himſelfe, which knew beſt what was to be done, did both diſpence and ratifie my ſeconde mariage againe whoſe doynges I meruayle that any man wyll ſpeake or write: And as to the determination of the Vniuerſitie, I am a woman and lack wyt and learnyng to aunſwere to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iuſtly or partially: for this I am ſure, that neyther the kinges father, nor my father would haue conditcended to our mariage, if it had beene declared to be vnlawfull: and where you ſaye that I ſhould put the cauſe to eyght perſons of this realme for quyetneſſe of the kings conſcience, I praye God ſende his grace a quyet conſcience: and thys ſhall be your aunſwere: That I ſay I am hys lawfull wyfe, and him lawfully maryed, and by the order of the holy Church I was to him eſpouſed as his true wyfe, although I was not ſo worthy, and in that point I will abide till the Court of Rome which was prime to the beginning haue made thereof a determination and finall ending. With thys aunſwere the Lordes departed to the king, which was ſorie to heare of her wilfull opinion, and in eſpeciall that ſhe more truſted to the Popes lawe, then in keeping the precepts of God.

Meſſage ſent to the Quene

The king like a politique prince, perceiued that the Marchant ſtraungers, and in eſpeciall Italyans, Spanyardes & Portyngales daylie brought Wade, Oyle, Silke, Clothes of Golde, Veluet, and other Marchaundiſe into this realme, and therefore receyued readie money, which money they euer deliuered to other Marchaunts by exchaunge, and neuer employed the ſame money on the cõmodities of this realme, ſo that thereby the king was hyndered in his cuſtome outwarde, and alſo the commodities of his realme were not vttered, to the great hinderaunce of his ſubiectes: wherefore he cauſed a proclamation to be made in Midſommer Terme, accordyng to an olde Estatute made in the time of king Rychard the second: That no person should make any exchaunge contrarie to the true meaning of the same Act and Estatute, vpon payne to be taken the kings mortall enemie, and to forfeyt all that he might forfeyt. After thys proclamation, many clothes and other commodities of this realme were well solde, but shortly after Marchauntes fell to exchaunge agayne, and the Proclamation was shortlye forgotten.

The king and the Queene after Whytsontide remoued to Windsore, and there contynued tyll the. xiiij. day of July, on which day the king remoued to Woodstock and left her at Wyndsore, where she laye a whyle, and after remoued to the Moore, and afterward to Estamstede: and after this day the king and shee neuer sawe together. Wherefore the common people daylie murmured and spake their foolishe fantasies. But the affayres of princes be not ordered by the common people, nor it were not conuenient that al things were opened to them.

The king sendeth certayne Lords to the Queene to Estamstede, to aduise her to be confirmable to the lawe of God, and to shewe vnto her, that all the Uniuersities had clerely determined, that the Pope could in no wise dispence with her mariage, and therefore the dispensation to which she most trusted of all, was clerely voyde and of none effect. These, with many mo causes and aduisements were declared to her, which nothing moued her at all, but still she sayde: Truely I am the kings true wyfe, and to him maryed: and if all Doctors were dead, or law, or learning so farre out of mans minde at that time of our mariage, yet I can not thinke that the Courte of Rome, and the whole Churche of Englande would consent to a thing vnlawfull and detestable (as you call it) but still I say I am his wife, and for him will I pray. With this aunswere the Lordes departed, and came to the king and made report as you haue heard.

This mariage was not alonely talked of in Englande, but in Fraunce Spayne, Italy, yea, through all christendome in maner, and especially in the Emperours Court, in so much as a great Marques of Spaine sayde to Syr Nicholas Harup knight being the kings Ambassador in the Emperors Court at Gaunt: My Lorde Ambassador of England, I maruayle not a little why the king your maister dalyeth so with the Emperours Iunte, shee is discended I assure you of a noble blood, and high parentage, the Emperours Maiestie maye not nor will not suffer such iniurie to be done to hys blood and lynage, that she should whole .xxij. yeres and moze serue him as his wyfe and bedfelow, and now to reiect her, what princely maner is that, therein is neyther loue nor loyaltie? For if a poore verlet had so long serued a Prince, what heart could he haue then reiected him or put him from him? it can not be sayd that your king is well counsayled: the matter is much marueyled at amongest Christian Princes, and thinke her not to be honestly handeled nor honorably: And if it be so that she be not his wife (because shee was once his brothers wyfe) as your Doctors say and affirme, then no man can excuse your king nor say but that she hath beene euill handeled, and kept like a Concubine or Paramour for the bodily appetite, which is a great spot, shame and rebuke to her, and to her whole lynage, which spot no waies can be sponged out nor recompenced, for shame in a kyndred can by no treasure be redemed: If the king your maister remember well this matter, he shall fynde that it transcendeth farre aboue the losse of earthly possessions, I would he would be better aduised.

The Englishe Imballadour answered: My Lorde, my commission extendeth not to answere this matter, but to enforme you of the truth, I will somewhat say beside my commission: First I say to you, that the king my maister neuer ment in this matter but honorably, truly, and vertuously, both for the pleasure of God and the profite and suretie of his realme, nor neuer was nor will be any Prince that euer was better contented and pleased with a woman then he hath bene with her, nor neuer prince more loued, cherished, nor honoured a woman then the king my maister hath done her, and would with heart, minde, and will her still keepe as hys wyfe, if Gods lawe woulde suffer it: My Lorde if you remember well all thyng, you shall finde that this doubt was first moued in the counsayle of Spayne, when the Emperour and the king of Englande were agreed, that the Emperour should marry the Ladie Marie the kings daughter: Vpon that communication this doubt was put to the Emperours counsayle, whether shee were the kings lawfull daughter or not, because that it was well knowne that he had maryed his brothers wyfe. In Answere.

This matter was not so secret but it spred into the counsayle both of Fraunce and Flaunders to the great defamation of the king of Englande, and to the great vncertainetie of the succession of his realme, whereof when he was aduertised, I thinke neuer prince tooke it more sorowfully nor more heauily, and for satisfying of his conscience, he called his Clergie and felt their opinions, and not trusting his awne subtelties onely (which I ensure you be excellently learned) sent to all the Vniuersities of Fraunce, Italy, and dyuers other realmes to knowe their iudgements in this case, and surely the king my mayster sore lamenteth this chaunce, and bewayleth the tyme mispent if it so succeede, for then is his realme destitute of a lawfull heyre begotten of his bodie, which is the greatest displeasure that maye come to a prince: the mariage was well ment both of the kings father and the Queenes Father, and they maryed together by the aduise and counsayle of their friendes, and louingly continued together as man and wyfe without any scruple or doubt, tyll you of Spayne moued first the question and put the mariage in ambiguitie, and therefore you cannot with honour thinke but that the king hath done lyke a wise prince to searche out the solution of your doubt, which so neere toucheth his soule and the suretie of his realme: And all thing that he hath done, he hath done by great aduisement, and with a great deliberation, wherefore no reasonable man can saye but he hath done lyke a wise and vertuous prince. The Marques hearing thys answere sayde, that the king did wisely to trie the truth, and was somewhat ashamed of that that hee had spoken, as I was enformed by them that were present.

You haue heard before how the Clergy in their conuocation had graunted to the king the somme of one hundred thousand pounde to be pardoned of the Premunire: for leuying of the which somme, euery Bishop in hys Dioces called before hym all the Priestes as well Chauntrie and paryshe Priestes, as Persones and Vycars, amongst whome Doctor John Stoke- The Clergie graunted to ỹ king frankly of themselues one hundred thousande pounde, to be pardoned of ỹ premunire.

ley Bishop of London, a man of great wyt and learning, but of litle discretion and humanytie (which caused hym to be out of the fauor of the common people) called before hym all the Priestes within the Citie of London, whether they were Curates or Stipendaries, the first day of Septēber beyng Fryday, in the Chapiter house of saynt Paull, at which day the Priestes appered, and the Bishoppes policie was to haue one by sir or eyght priestes together, and by persuasion to haue caused them to graunt some portion toward the payment of the foresayde one hundreth thousand pounde, but the number of the priestes was so great, for they were sixe hundred at the leaste, and with them came many Temporall men to heare the matter, that the Bishop was disapointed of his purpose: for when the Bishops Officers called in certaine priests by name into the Chapiter house: with that a great number entred, for they put the Bishops Officers that kept the doore a side. After this the Officers got the doore shut agayne: then the priestes without sayde: We wyll not be kept without, and our fellowes be within: we knowe not what the bishop will doe with them. The Temporall men beyng present stomoked and comforted the priestes to enter, so that by force they opened the doore, and one strake the Bishoppes Officer ouer the face and entred the Chapiter house, and many Temporall men with them, and long it was or any silence coulde be made: at last when they were appeased, the Bishop stood vp and sayd: Brethren, I maruayle not a litle why you be so heddy and know not what shal be said to you, therfore I pray you to kepe silence and to heere me patiently: My friendes all, you know well that we be men fraile of condicion and no Angelles, and by fraylty and lack of wisedome we haue misdemeaned our selues toward the king our Soueraigne Lorde and his lawes, so that all we of the Clergy were in the Premunire, by reason wherof, all our promotions, landes goodes, and Catelles, were to hym forfayte and our bodyes ready to be emprisoned, yet his grace moued with pitie and compassion, demaunded of vs what wee coulde say why he shoulde not extend hys lawes vpon vs, then the fathers of the Clergye humbly besought hys grace of mercye, to whome he aunswered that he was euer enclyned to mercy: then for all our great offences we had litle penaunce, for where he might by rigor of his law haue taken all our linelod, goodes and Catelles, he was contented with one hundred. M. poundes to be payde in fiue peres: and although that this somme be more then we may easly beare, yet by the rygor of his lawes we shoulde haue borne the whole burden: Wherfore my brethren, I charitably exhorte you to beare your partes of your linelod and salary towarde the payment of this somme graunted. Then it was shortly sayde to the Bishop: My Lorde twentie nobles a pere is but a bare liuing for a priest, for now vittaile and euery thing in maner is so dere, that pouertie in maner inforceth vs to say nay: beside that, my Lorde we neuer offended in the Premunire, for we neuer medled with the Cardinalles faculties, let the Bishops and Abbottes which haue offended pay. Then the Bishops officers gaue to the priestes high wordes, which caused them to be the more obstinate. Also diuers temporall men which were present comforted the priestes, and bade them agree to no payment. In this rumor, diuers of the Bishops seruauntes were buffeted and stricken so that the Bishop began to be afrayde, and with fayre wordes appeased the noyse, and for all thinges which were done or sayde, there he pardoned them and gaue to them hys blessyng, and prayed them to depart in charitie. And then they departed thinkyng to heare no more of the matter, but they were deceyued, for the Bishop went to sir Thomas Moore then beyng Lorde Chauncelor (which greatly fauoured the Bishop, and the Clergie) and to him made a grieuous complaint and declared the fact very grieuously, wherevpon commaundement was sent to sir Thomas Pargiter Maior of the Citie, to attache certaine prelates and temporall men, and so .xv. prelates, and fiue temporall men were arrested, of the which, some were sent to the Tower, some to the Fleete, and other prisons, where they remayned long after.

Thomas Abell.

In this season were diuers preachinges in the realme, one contrary to another concernyng the kings mariage, and in especiall one Thomas Abell Clerke, both preached and wrote a Booke, that the mariage was lawfull, which caused many simple men to beleue his opinion: This Abell was the Quenes Chaplaine, and wrote this booke to please her withall: Wherfore the king caused a determination of the Vniuersities, and all the iudgements of great Clerkes to be compyled into a Booke, and to be printed, whiche Booke did satisfie the myndes of all indifferent and discrete persons: But some men were partiall, that neyther learnyng, nor reason could satisfie their wilfull myndes.

This yere the king kept his Christmasse at Greenewich with great solemnitie, but all men sayde that there was no mirth in that Christmasse, because the Queene and the Ladies were absent.

A Parliament.

After Christmasse, the .xv. day of January the Parliament began to sit and amongest diuers griefes which the Commons were grieued with, they saye complayned of the cruelitie of the Ordinaryes, for callyng men before them Ex officio: that is, by reason of their office: For the Ordinaries would send for men, and lay accusations to them of Heresie, and saye they were accused, and lay Articles to them, but no Accuser shoulde be brought foorth, which to the Commons was very dreadefull and grieuous: for the party so accused must either abiure or be burned, for Purgation he might make none.

When this matter and other Exactions done by the Clergie in theyr Courts were long debated in the common house, at the last it was concluded and agreed, that all the griefes which the temporall men were grieued with, should be put in writyng, and deliuered to the king, which by great aduice was done: Wherefore the .xviij. day of March the Common speaker accompanied with diuers Knightes and Burgesses of the Common house, came to the kinges presence, and there declared to him how the Temporall men of his realme were sore agrieued with the cruell demeanour of the prelates and Ordinaries, which touched both their bodies and goodes, al which griefes, the Speaker deliuered to the king in writyng, most humbly beseechyng his grace to take such an order and direction in that case, as to his high wisedome might seeme most conuenient. Further he beseeched the king to consider what paine, charge and cost, his humble subiectes of the nether house had sustayned sith the begynnyng of this Parliament, and that it would please his grace of his Princely benignitie to dissolue his Court of Parliament, that his subiectes might repayre into their Countries.

sed a while, and then sayde: it is not the office of a king which is a Iudge to be to lyght of credence, nor I haue not, nor will not vse the same: for I will heare the partie that is accused speake or I give any sentence: your Booke conteineth diuers articles of great and weightie matters, and as I perceiue it is agaynst the Spirituall persons and prelates of our Realme, of which thing you desyre a redresse and a reformation, which desire and request is meere contrariaunt to your last petition: For you require to haue the parliament dissolued and to depart into your countries, and yet you would haue a reformation of your grieues with all diligence. Although that your paines haue bene great in tarying, I assure you mine hath bene no lesse then yours, and yet all the payne that I take for your wealthes, is to me a pleasure: therfore if you will haue profite of your complaint, you must tary the tyme, or else to be without remedie: I much commend you that you will not contend nor stand in strife with the Spirituall men, which be your Christen brethren but much more me thinketh that you should not contend with mee, that am your souereigne Lorde and king, considering that I seeke peace and quietnesse of you: For I haue sent to you a Bill concerning wardes and primer seasons, in the which thinges I am greatly wronged: Wherefore I haue offered you reason as I thinke, yea, and so thinketh all the Lordes, for they haue set their handes to the Booke: Therefore I assure you, if you will not take some reasonable ende nowe when it is offered, I will search out the extremitie of the law, and then will I not offer you so much againe: With this aunswere, the Speaker and his companie departed. The cause why the king spake these wordes was this: Daply men made Feoffements of their landes to their vses, and declared their willes of there landes with such remainders, that not alonely the king, but all other Lordes lost their Wardes, Mariages, and reliefes, and the king also lost his primer seasons, & the profite of the lyuerey, which was to him very preiudiciall, & a great losse: wherfore he, like an indifferent Prince, not willyng to take all, nor to lose all, caused a Bill to be drawen by his learned counsaile, in the which was deuised, that euery man might make his will of the halfe of his land, so that he left the other halfe to the heyre by discent. When this Bill came first amongest the Commons, Lord how the ignorant persons were grieued, and how shamefully they spake of the Bill, and of the kinges learned Counsaile: But the wyse men which vnderstoode & saw the mischiefe to come, would gladly haue had the Bill to be assented to, or at the least to haue put the king in a suretie of the thirde or fourth part, which offer I was credibly informed the king would haue taken: But many frowarde and wilfull persons, not regarding what might ensue (as it did in deede) woulde neither consent to the Bill as the Lordes had agreed & set to their handes, nor yet agree to no reasonable qualification of the same, which afterward they sore repented: For after this, the king called the Iudges, and best learned men of his realme, & they disputed this matter in the Chauncery, and agreed that lande could not be willed by the order of the Common lawe: Wherevpon an act was made, that no man might declare his will of no part of his lande: which Act sore grieued the Lordes and Gentlemen that had many children to set forth. Therefore you may iudge what mischiefe commeth of wilfull blindnesse, and lacke of forelight in so great causes.

This

This Parliament was prorogued till the tenth day of Aprill, in the which Parliament was an Act made, that Bishoppes should pay no more Annates or money for their Bulles to the Pope: for it was openly proued, that there was paide for the Bulles of Bishops, since the fourth yere of king Henry the seuenth, the kinges father, till this yere, one hundreth. lx. thousande pounde sterlyng, beside all other Dispensations, and pardons, whereof the summe was incredible.

Bulles of Rome carped great treasure out of Englande.

When the Parliament was begonne againe after Easter, there came downe to the Common house the Lorde Chauncelor, the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Erles of Arundell, Orforde, Northumberland, Rutland, Wilshire, and Sussex, and after they were set, the Lorde Chauncelor declared, how the king was aduertised by his Counsaile, and in especiall by the Duke of Norffolke, how on the Marches betwene England and Scotland was very little habitation on the Englishe syde, but on the Scottish side was great habitation, and the Scottes dwelled euen iust on the Border, by reason whereof they inuaded Englande diuers tymes, and did to the kinges subiectes great hurt, and displeasure: Wherefore the king intended to make dwellyng houses there, and also to make newe diuers pyles and stoppes to let the Scottishe men from their inuasions, to the great commoditie of all his people there dwellyng, which things could not be done without great cost: Wherefore considerying the kinges good entent, he sayde that the Lordes thought it conuenient to graunt to the king some reasonable aide toward his charges, and prayed the Commons to consult on the same, and then he and all the Lordes departed.

After their departure, the Commons considerying the kinges good entent, louyngly graunted to him a fiftene toward his charges, but this graūt was not enacted at this Session, because that sodainly became a Pestilence in Westmynster, wherefore the Parliament was prorogued till the next yere.

In this yere was an olde Tolle demaunded in Flaunders of Englishe men, called the Tolle of the Hounde, which is a Riuer and a passage: The Tolle is. xij. pence of a Fardell. This Tolle had bene often tymes demaunded but neuer payed: insomuch that king Henry the seuenth, for the demaūd of that Tolle prohibited all his subiectes to kepe any Mart at Andwarpe or Barow, but caused the Martes to be kept at Calice: at which tyme it was agreed that the sayde Tolle should neuer be demaunded, so that the Englishe men would resort againe into the Dukes Countrie, and after that, it was not demaunded till nowe: Wherefore the king sent Doctor Knight, and other to Calice, and thether came the Emperours Commissioners, and the matter was put in suspence for a tyme.

Ye haue heard before how the king had purchased the Bishop of Yorkes place, which was a fayre Bishoppes house, but not meete for a king: Wherfore the king purchased all the Medowes about saint James, and all the whole house of saint James, and there made a fayre Mansion and a Parke, and buylded many costly and commodious houses for great pleasure, which now is called saint James house.

The buylding of the kynges house called Saint James.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Lady Anne Bulleyne was so much in the kings fauour, that the common people which knewe not the kinges true entent, sayde and thought that the absence of the Quene was onely for her her sake, which was not true: for the king was openly rebuked of preachers for keping company with his brothers wife, which was the occasion that he eschued her companie, till the truth were tryed.

The king calleth the Speaker and certain other of the cõmon house vnto him and deliuereth them the aunswere that the clergy made to articles deliuered to the king the last yere.

The last day of Aprill the parliament sytting, the kyng sent for Thomas Awdeley speaker of the common house, and certaine other, and declared to them, how they had exhibited a booke of their greeues, the last yere agaynst the spiritualtie, which at their requestes, he had deliuered to his spirituall subiectes, to make aunswere there to, but he could haue no aunswere, till within three dayes last past, which aunswere he deliuered to the speaker saiyng: we thinke their aunswere will smally please you, for it seemeth to vs very slender, you be a great sort of wisemen, I doubt not but you will looke circumspectly on the matter, and we will be indifferent betweene you. And for a truth their aunswere was verie Sophistical, and nothing auoyding the griefes of the laye people: and farther the king sayde, that he marueyled not a little, why one of the parliament house spake openly of the absence of the Queene from him, which matter was not to be determined there, for he sayd it touched his soule, and wished the matrimony to be good, for then had he neuer bene vexed in conscience, but the Doctors of the Universities sayde he, haue determined the mariage to be voyde, and detestable before God, which grudge of conscience, caused mee to absteyne from her company, and no foolishe or wanton appetite: for I am sayde he. xlj. yere olde, at which age the lust of man is not so quick, as in lustie youth: and saiing in Spaine and Portyngall it hath not bene sene, that one man hath maryed two sisters, the one being carnally knowne before, but the brother to mary the brothers wyfe was so abhorred amongst all nations, that I neuer heard it, that any christen man did it, but by my selfe: wherefore you see my conscience troubled and so I pray you repeyt: so the speaker departed, and declared to the commons the kinges saiyng, both of the spirituall mens answere, and also concerning the kinges mariage, which slight aunswere displeased the commons.

The occasion why the king spake of this mariage, was because one Temse in the common house, moued the commons to sue to the king to take the Quene againe into his company, and declared certaine great mischiefs, as in Bastardyng the Ladie Marie the kings onely childe, and diuers other inconueniences, which wordes were reported to the king, which was the cause that he declared his conscience.

The king againe sendeth for the speaker and other and deliuereth them an othe for the Clergy.

The. xj. day of May, the king sent for the speaker againe, and twelue of the common house, hauing with him eight Lordes, and sayde to them, welbeloued subiectes, we thought that the Clergie of our realme had bene our subiectes wholy, but now we haue well perceyued that they be but halfe our subiectes, yea, and scace our subiectes: for all the Prelates at their consecration made an othe to the Pope, cleane contrarie to the othe that they make to vs, so that they seme to be his subiectes, & not ours, the copy of both the othes I deliuer here to you, requiring you to inuent some order, that we be not thus deluded of our spirituall subiectes. The speaker departed, and caused the othes to be red in the common house, the verye tenour whereof ensueth.

Sir Thomas Moore diſcharged of the Chaunceloriſhip.

The opening of theſe othes, was one of the occaſions, why the Pope within two yere following, loſt all his iuriſdiction in England, as you ſhall heare afterward. The. xiiij. day the parliament was prorogued till the fourth day of Februarie next enſuyng. After which prorogation, Syr Thomas Moore Chauncellor of Englande, after long ſutes made to the king to be diſcharged of that office the ſirtene day of May, he deliuered to the king at Weſtminſter, the great ſeale of Englande, and was with the kings fauor diſcharged, discharged, which seale the king kept till Whitsontyde followyng, and on the Monday in Whitson weeke, he dubbed Thomas Awdeley speaker of the parliament knight, and made him Lord keeper of the great Seale, and so was he called.

Thomas Awdeley Lorde keper of the seale.

The king beyng in progresse this Sommer was aduertised that the Pope and the Frenche king had appoynted to meete at Marcelles in Prouince, in the beginning of the next spring, wherefore the king lyke a wyse and pollitike prince, thought it conuenient to speake with the Frenche king in his awne person, before the Pope and he should come together, and to declare to him both the determinatiō of the Uniuersities and Doctors, concerning his matrimonie, and also the generall counsayles, which ordeyned suche causes, to be tried in the prouinces and Countries, where the doubt should rise, trusting that the French king should cause the Pope to encline to Gods lawe, and to leaue his awne traditions, and voyde dispensations, wherevpon both the princes concluded to meete in October folowyng, betwene Calice and Bulleyn: wherefore the king of Englande sent out hys letters to his nobilitie, prelates, and seruauntes, commaundyng them to be readie at Cauntorburie, the. xxvj. daye of September, to passe the Seas with him, for the accomplishyng of the enteruew betwene him and his brother the French king. Many men were sory to heare, that the king should passe the Sea in winter, and especially in October, when the seas be rough, but their sayings letted not his purpose: for he marched forward from Imphill to Wyndsore, where on Sunday beyng the first day of September, he created the Ladie Anne Bulleyn, Marchionesse of Penbroke, and gaue to her one thousand pounde lande by the yere, and that solemnitie finished, he rode to the College to Masse, and when the Masse was ended, a newe league was concluded and swore, betwene the king and the French king, Mesire Pomoray the French Imbassadour then being present. After which othe taken. Doctor Fox the kings Almer made an eloquent oration in Latin, in praise of peace, loue, and amitie: which done the Trumpets blewe, and the king returned to the Castel, where was kept a solemne feast. From thence the king remoued to Grenewich, & so forward to Cantorbury, where at the day appointed, he found redie furnished al such as were cōmaunded to passe the sea with him, wel & richely adourned, both they and their seruants.

A meting appointed of the French king and the king of Englands betwene Calice and Bulleyne.

Lady Anne Bulleyne made Marchionesse of Penbroke.

A new league

The tenth day of October, the king came to Douer, and on the. xj. day in the morning beyng Fryday, at three of the clocke, he tooke shypping in Douer rode, and before ten of the clocke the same daye, he with the Ladye Marchionesse of Penbroke landed at Calice, where he was honorably receyued with procession, and brought to Saint Nicholas Churche, where he heard Masse, and so to his place called the Exchequer, where he lodged, and on the Sundaye after came to Calice, the Lorde Roche Baron, and Mounsire de Mountpesat, messengers from the Frenche king, aduertising the king of Englande, that the Frenche king would repayre to Abuile the same night marchyng towarde Bulleyne, of which tydings the king was verie glad: but sodainly came a messenger and reported that the great Maister of Fraunce, and the Archebishop of Roan, with diuers noble men of Fraunce were come to Sandifield, entending to come to Calice, to salute the king, from the king their maister. He beyng thereof aduertised, sent in great haste the .xv. day of October, the Duke of Norffolke, the Marques of Excester, the Erles of Orford, Darby, and Rutlande, the Lorde Sandes, and the Lorde Fitzwater, with three hundred Gentlemen, which honorably receyued the French Lordes at the Englishe pale, and so brought them to the kings presence in Calice, which stood vnder a rich cloth of estate of such value that they muche mused of the ryches. The king (as he that knewe all honor and nurture) receyued the Frenche Lordes very louyngly and amiably, and with them tooke a day and place of meeting: these Lords were highly feasted, and after departed to Bulleyn.

While the king lay thus in Calice, he vewed the walles, towers, and Bulwarkes, and deuised certaine newe fortifications, for the maintenaunce and defence of the towne. The towne of Calice had at this season .xiiij.C. beddes, and stabling for two thousand horses, beside the villages adiacent.

The twentie day of this moneth, the king beyng aduertised, that the French king was come to a Village called Marguison nigh to the English pale, marched out of Calice the next day after, accompanied with the Dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, and with the Marques of Dorset and Excester, the Erles of Arrondell, Orforde, Surrey, Esser, Derby, Rutlande, Huntingdon, and Sussex, and diuerse Viscountes, Barones, knights of the Garter, and Gentlemen, freshly appareled, and richly trymmed, and so passed toward the place, appointed for the enterueiw, leuing behind them the greatest part of the powre of Calice, because that Bulleyne was to litle for both the traynes. For the Frenchmen sayde their trayne was twentie thousande horse, which caused the Englishmen to cast many perilles, and especially because it was bruted abrode, that the French king shoulde saye the king of England was once his enemie, and mayntayned the Emperor and the Duke of Burbon against him, & now was become his most friende. The rehersing of these olde grudges, many Englishmen suspected, and very loth that the king shou'd go to Bulleyne, but the king continued still in his iourney, and came to Sandingfield, and a litle from that place in a valey, was the French king nobleiy accompanyed with three hundred horse, and not many more. The kinges trayne waued on the left hande, to geue the French king and his trayne the right hande: likewise did the French part, to geue the Englishmen the right hand: so the two kinges with all louing honor, met with bare beddes, and embraced other in such fashion, that all that beheld them reioyced. And at their meeting the French king sayd openly, to the king of England: Syr you be the same persone, that I am moste bounde to in the worlde, and sith it hath pleased you, in persone to visite me, I am bound in person to seke you, and for the very friendship, that I haue found in you, I am yours and will be, and so I requyre you to take me: the king of England soberly answered, if euer I did thing to your liking I am glad, and as touching the payne to come hether to se you, I assuer you it is my comfort, yea, and I had come farther to haue visited you. Then the kinges embraced the Lordes and estates, as the French king the Lordes of England, and the king of England the Lordes of Fraunce, and that done, they set forward toward Bulleine, and in ryding they cast of Haukes called Sakers, to the Kytes, which made to them great sporte. And in a valley beyond Sandingfielde, the king of Nauer met the kinges, and there they alighted and dranke, and after that they mounted on horsebacke, and with hauking and other princely pastime, they came nere to Bulleyne, where on a hyll stoode ranged in a fayre bande, the number of fiue hundred men on horsebacke, of whome the chiefe were, the French kinges three sonnes, the Dolphin, the Duke of Orleaunce, and the Duke of Angulesme, and on them gaue attendaunce, the Admyrall of Fraunce, and three Cardinalles, with diuerse other nobles of Fraunce, these three Princes marched forward, and welcomed the king of Englande: which them well beheld and louingly them receyued, as he that coulde as much nurture, as any Prince that euer was. Then the French king sayd to his children openly: My children I am your father, but to this Prince here you are as much bounde, as to me your naturall father, for he redemed me and you from captiuitie: wherefore on my blessing I charge you, to be to him louing alwayes. The king of Englande ceassed the French kinges tale, and embraced the yong Princes, eche after other. Then all the noble company came to Bulleyne, where was a great shot of Artillery, for on the one side they shotte great pelletes, which made a great noyse: then these two Princes offered at our lady of Bullein and the French king brought the king of Englande to his lodging, in the Abbay directly against his owne lodging, where the king of England had diuerse chambers richly furnished. Euery man was appointed to his lodging (which there was very straycht) according to his degree, and great chere was made to all the Englishmen: the Poultries, Larders, Spiceris, and sellers of wine were all open, and likewise Hay and Litter, and all other thinges, aske and haue, and no man durst take any money, for the French king payd for all.

The kinges comming to Bulleyne.

In the Church of Bulleyn was a trauers set vp by the French king, open on euery syde sauyng it was sieled with blew veluet, embraudered with flower Delices of gold, the pillers were hanged with the same worke: On the French kinges right hande, was another trauers sieled, and curtened all of white Satten, embraudered with Cables cast, of cut cloth of Golde, embraudered and gilted after the fashion that Mariners call their ropes: this trauers was valenced of lyke worke, and fringed with fine golde. Dayly the kinges heard their Masses in these traverses, and commonly they went together to Masse. Diuers tymes the kinges commoned together in counsail, and sometyme in the morning for the Princes were stirryng, their Counsayles met, and sat together a great whyle.

While the king of England lay thus at Bulleyn, the French king to shew himselfe louyng to the noble men of England, the .xxv. day of October, called a Chapiter of the Companions of his order, called Saint Michell, of whom the king of England was one, and so there elected Thomas Duke of Norfolke, and Charles Duke of Suffolke, to be companions of the sayde Order, which were brought into the sayd Chapiter, and had their Collers deliuered to them, and were swoorne to the Statutes of the Order, their obeysaunce to their soueraigne Lorde, alwayes reserued: which Dukes thanked the French king, and gaue to the officers of Armes two hundred Crownes a peece. And these two kinges rested at Bulleyne, Monday, Tewesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and on Friday the .xxvj. day of October, they departed out of Bulleyn to Calice: the French kinges traine was twelue hundred persons, and so many horse or more, and without Calice two myle, met with them the Duke of Richmonde, the kinges bastard sonne of England, a goodly yong Prince, and full of fauour and beautie, with a great companie of noble men, which were not at Bulleyn, so the Duke with his companie, embraced the French king, and so did other noble men, then the Lordes of England set forward, as the dukes of Richmond, Norffolke, and Suffolke the Marques of Excester, the Erles of Arundell, Oxford, Surrey, Darby, Worcester, Rutlande, Sussex, and Huntingdon, the Viscountes of Lisle, and Rochforde, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincolne, and Bathe, the Lorde William Haward, the Lorde Watreuerse, the Lord Montacute, the Lorde Cobham, the Lorde Sandes, the Lorde Bray, the Lorde Morgant, the Lord Leonard Gray, the Lord Clinton, and sir William Fitzwilliam knight, treasorer of the kings house, & sir William Paulet, Comptrollor of the same, with a great number of knightes, besyde the lustie Esquiers, and yong Gentlemen. These noble personages and Gentlemen of England accompanied the French Lordes to Newnam Bridge, where as Thomas Palmer Capitaine of the Fortresse, with a fayre companie of Souldiours saluted the kinges, and so they passed towarde Calice: where at their comming, that what out of the towne and Castell, and what out of Ricebancke, and the Shippes in the Hauen, the Frenchmen sayde they neuer heard such a shot: and when they were entered the Mill gate, all the Souldiors of the towne stoode on the one syde, appareled in red and blewe, and on the other syde of the stretes, stoode all the seruyng men of England in cotes of French Tawney, with their Lordes and Maisters deuises embraudered, and euery man a Scarlet Cap and a white feather, which made a goodly shewe: there were lodged in Calice that night, besyde the towne dwellers, eight thousand persons at the least. The king of England brought the French king to hys lodgyng, to the Staple Inne, where he was most honourably lodged, and all thinges furnished that belonges to the same. If the French king made good cheere to the king of England, and his trayne at Bulleyn, I assure you he and his traine, were requited at Calice, for the plentie of wilde foule, Venison, fishe, and all other thinges which were there, it was marualle to see, for the kinges Officers of England, had made preparation in euery place, so that the Frenchmen were serued, with such multitude of diuers fishes, this Friday and Saterday, that the Maisters of the French kinges houshold, much wondered at the prouision. In likewise on the Sonday, they had all maner of flesh, foule, spice, Venison, both of falow Dere, and red Dere, and as for wine they lacked none, so that well was the Englishe man that might well entertaine the French man: the Lordes of Fraunce neuer fetched their viandes, but they were sent to them, and often tyme their proporcion of vittaile was so aboundant, that they refused a great part thereof.

This Syr Wylliam is he that nowe is Lord treasorer of England.

The receyuing of the French king into Calice.

While the kings were thus in Calice, they road euery day to saint Maries Church, where were set two trauerses, the one for the french king: the other for the king of England. The Sunday at night, the French king supped with the king of England. The French king was serued with three courses, and his meate dressed after the French fashion, and the king of England had like courses after the English fashion, the first course of euery king was. xl. dyshes, the second. lx. the third. lxx. which were costly and pleasant. per, was a sumpteous and royall maske.

The Tewesday next folowyng, beyng the. xxi. day of October, the two kinges departed out of Calice, and came nere to Sandingfield, and there alighted in a fayre greene place, where was a Table set, and there the Englishmen serued the French men of wine, Ipocras, fruite, and spice aboundantly. When the two kinges had commoned a little, they mounted on their horses, and at the very entring of the French ground, they tooke handes, and with Princely countenaunce, louyng behauiour, and hartie wordes, eche embraced other, and so there departed.

The kinges departure.

While the king of England was in the French kinges dominions, he had the vpper hande, and likewyse had the French king in his dominion, and as the French king payed all the Englishe mens charges at Bulleyn, so did the king of England at Calice, so that euery thing was recompensed: sauyng that the king of England gaue to the French king, diuers precious iewels, and great horses, and to his Nobles great plentie of Plate, for the which I could neuer heere, that he gaue the king of England any other thing, but the white Gowne, as you haue heard, but to the Lordes of the kings counsaile, he gaue certaine Plate and Chaynes.

When the king was returned to Calice, many Gentlemen tooke shippe to sayle into England, but the winde was so contrariant, that diuers of them were driuen backe againe into Calice, and diuers into Flaunders, and in Nouember rose suche a winde, out of the North and Northwest, that all the shippes in Calice hauen were in great ieopardie, and in especiall the Hoyes, at which season was such a spring tyde, that it brake the walles of Holland, and Zeland, and drowned diuers townes in Flaunders, insomuch that the water rose three foote aboue the Wharfe, where the key stood in Andwarp: This storme continued till the fourth day of Nouember, but for all that the winde chaunged not. The. viij. day rose such a winde, tempest, and thunder, that no man could conueniently stirre in the stretes of Calice: much lamentation was made for them that had taken shippe into Englande, for no man knew what was become of them. On Sunday the weather was fayre, the king caused his bed and other thinges to be shipped, and entended to depart, but sodainly rose such a mist, that no Maister could guyde a shippe, and so he taryed that day. On Tewesday at midnight he tooke ship, and landed at Douer the morow after, beyng the. xiiij. day of Nouember, at fiue of the clocke in the morning, wherfore the Saterday after, was song Te Deum in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule in London: The Lord keper of the great seale, the Maior of London, (and diuers other noble and sad persons, which made their abode in London, for the gouernaunce of the realme in the kings absence) beyng present. The king after his returne, maried priuily the Lady Anne Bulleyn, on saint Erkenwaldes day beyng the last day of Aprill.

A great flood in Holland and Zeland.

The king maried to Lady Anne Bulleyn.

When the king should passe ouer the sea, he considered that the Scottes had robbed his subiects, both by sea and land, and that no redresse was made for the same, imagined that in his absence they would attempt some outragious enterprice against his people, wherefore like a prudent Prince, to be in a suretie, he sent sir Arthur Darcy knight, with three hundred tall men to Barwicke, to defend the inuasions of the Scottes. The Scottes heeryng of his comming, came into Northumberland, by the middle Marches, and came to a place called Fowbery, and in their iourney fired certaine billages and returned. Sir Arthur Darcy heeryng of this aduenture, was nothing content. Now at this season their lay at Barwike, Archibalde Douglas Erle of Angus, which had maried the Queene of Scottes the kings sister, and was banished Scotland, and she was from him diuorced, and maryed to another. The Scotes bragged of their enterprise, & sayd that sir Arthur had brought them good lucke, and sayd, that he and the Erle of Angus, slept well in Barwicke: they hearyng of this brag, made a roade with foure hundred men into Scotland, and set a village on fire: then shortly assembled together. viij. hundred Scottes. When the Englishmen perceyued the Scottes, they caused their trumpet to blow a retreate, and the Erle and.xx. with him, shewed him selfe on a hill, euen in the face of the Scottes, and the trumpet blewe at their backes, so that the Scottes thought that there had beene two companies, which caused the Scottes to flie, and the Englishemen folowed, and slue a great number, and tooke many prisoners, and brought them to Barwicke the.xx. day of October.

Margaret Queene of Scots diuorced from the Erle of Angus, and maried to another.

The king this yere kept his Christmasse at Grenewich, and after Christmasse sir Thomas Awdeley, Lorde keper of the great Seale, was made Chauncelor of England, and when the Parliament began, because the office of the Speaker was voyde, Humfrey Wingfielde of Grayes Inne, was elected Speaker of the Parliament, which was presented accordyng as you haue heard of the other Speaker before. In the which Parliament was made an acte, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme, to the Court of Rome, but from Commissary to the Bishop, and from Bishop to Archbishop, and from Archbishop to the king, and all causes of the king, to be tryed in the vpper house of the Conuocation. And in the same Parliament was enacted, that Queene Katheryn should from thencefoorth, be no more called Queene, but princes Dowagar of prince Arthur.

Sir Thomas Awdeley made chauncelor.

Queene Katheryn called princes Dowager.

In this Sommer season last past, died William Warham Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and to that Bishopricke was named Doctor Thomas Cranmer, the kinges Chaplayn, a man of good learnyng, and of a vertuous life, which also not long before, was the kinges Ambassadour to the Bishop of Rome, which was consecrate in Lent.

Thomas Cranmer elected Archebishop of Cantorbury.

After the king perceyuyng his newe wife Queene Anne, to be great with childe, caused all officers necessary, to be appoynted to her, and so on Easter eue, she went to her Closet openly as Queene, with all solemnitie, and then the king appoynted the day of her coronation, to be kept on Whitsun Sunday next folowyng, and writynges were sent to all Shriues, to certifie the names of men of fortie pounde, to receyue the order of knighthod, or else to make a fine: the assessement of which fines, were appoynted to Thomas Cromwell, maister of the kinges Juell house, and Counsaylor to the king, and newly in his high fauor, which so politikely handeled the matter, that he raysed of that sessyng of fines, a great somme of money to the kinges vse: Also the king wrote letters to the Citie of London, to prepare Pagiauntes agaynst the same coronation.

The Lady Anne Bulleyne openly published to be Quene.

Thomas Cromwell maister of the kings Jewel house.

The king in the beginning of this .xxv. yere, kept the day of Saint George, at his Manor of Greenewich, with great solempnitie, and the Court was greatly replenished, with Lordes, Knightes, and with Ladies and Gentlewomen, to a great number, with all solace and pleasure. You haue heard the last yere, how the Parliament had enacted, that no person shoulde after a day, appele to Rome for any cause, whatsoeuer it were, and that the Quene, now called the princes Dowager, had appealed to the court of Rome, before the acte made, so that it was doubted, whether that appeale were good or not. This question was well handled in the parliament house but much better in the Conuocation house, but in both houses it was alleged yea, and by bookes shewed, that in the Counsayles of Calcedon, Affricke, Toletane, and diuers other famous Counsayles in the primatiue Churche yea, in the time of Saint Augustine, it was affirmed, declared, and determined, that a cause rising in one prouince, should be determined in the same, and that neyther the patriarcke of Constantinople, shoulde medle in causes moued in the iurisdiction of the patryarcke of Antioche, nor no Bishop shoulde entermit, with in an others prouince or countrye: which thinges were so clerkly opened and so conningly set forth to all intentes, that euery man that had witte, and was determined to follow the truth, and not affectionate nor wilfully wedded to his owne minde, might plainely se that all appeles made to Rome, were clerly voyde and of none effecte: which doctrines and counsayles, were shewed to the Lady Katerin princes Dowager, but shee (as women loue to lose no dignitie) euer continued in her olde song, trusting more to the Popes partiality, then to the determination of Christes verytye. Wherevppon the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, accompanyed with the Bishops of London, Wyncheſter, Bathe, Lincolne, and diuerse other great Clerkes, in a greate number roade to Dunstable, which is syx myle from Ampthil, where the princes Dowager lay, and there by a Doctor called Doctor Lee, she was assited to appere before the said Archbishop, in cause of matrimony, in the sayde towne of Donstable, & at the day of appearaunce she woulde not appere, but made defaute, and so she was called peremtorye, euery day fiftene dayes together, and at the last for lack of apparaunce, and for contumacie, by the assent of all the learned men there beyng present, shee was diuorsed from the king, and there maryage declared to be voyde and of none effecte, which sentence geuen, the Archebishoppe and all the other returned whether it pleased them.

Queene Katherin denoūced at Dunstable.

In the moneth of May Pope Clement sent an Orator to the kyng at Grene which certefiyng hym that he had appoynted a generall counsayle to be kept at Mantua the yere folowing, and therof had aduertised al princes Christen, requiring the king likewise as he did all other princes Christen for the vniuersall welth of all Christendome, and for the quieting of opinions newly growne, to appere there personally: to the which it was aunswered that it was bothe ieoperdous for the king, and for his whole realme to haue their Prince absent for feare of inuasions by outward enemies, but he sayde he would send thether a sufficient procurator and conuenient Proctors, and desired to see the Orators commission.

The Pope sendeth to the king to aduertise him that he had sommoned a generall counsell to be kept at Mantua.

The kinges aunswere.

When he with an euill wyll had shewed his commission, there appered neyther place nor time of the counsayle. For the king knewe well before hys comming that the Marques of Mantua had made a full denyall to the Pope that he would haue no such assemble to be kept in his Citie nor dominions, for dyuers great and vrgent causes, and so the Popes Orator departed with

A ſolempne Ambaſſade ſent to accompanye the French king to mete with the Pope at Nice.

The king beyng aduertiſed by the Frenche king howe that he and the Pope ſhould meete at Nice in June folowyng, thought it cõuenient to ſend a ſolempne Imbaſſade to the French king both to accompany him to Nice, and alſo to common with the Byſhop of Rome concernyng his vnlawfull ſtay in the kinges dewoyſe: wherupon he appointed the Duke of Northfolke, the Lorde Rochefort brother to the newe Queene, Sir William Pawlet Comptroller of the kings houſhold, Syr Anthony Browne, and Syr Fraunces Bryan knightes to be his Ambaſſadors, which made great prouiſion for that purpoſe, and ſo with the number of. C.lx. horſes came to Douer and ſo to Calice on Whitſõ euen (on which day the Quene made her entrie through the Citie of London towarde her coronation) where they made their abode a certayne ſpace, and paſſed through all Fraunce till they came to Lyons, where they remayned a ſpace as you ſhall heare after.

The Scots robbe and ſpoyle vpon the borders of England.

This verie ſeaſon was daylie ſkirmiſhing betweene the borderers of the Marches of Englande and Scotlande, and yet no warre proclaymed, and many robberies, murders and manſlaughters done on both partes, and although the Cõmiſſioners of the realmes of England and of Scotland at Newcaſtel vpon Tine were entreating a truce & amitie, yet during the communication the Scottes ceaſſed not to robbe both by ſea and lande, and toke dyuers little botes laden with corne and fiſhe, whereof hearing the king of Englande, he decked and bittayled diuers ſhippes of warre, and ſent them to the North ſeas to defende his ſubiectes. The Scottes hearing that the Engliſhe Nauie was come on their coſte, in all haſte fledde home to their harbor, but yet the Engliſhe men folowed them, and fetched many of their prayes out of their hauens mauger of their heades.

Proclamations made for prouiſion of the Quenes coronation.

In the beginning of May the king cauſed open proclamations to be made that all men that claymed to doe any ſeruice or execute any office at the ſolempne feaſt of the coronation, by the way of tenor, graunt or preſcription ſhould put their graunt three weekes after Eaſter in the Starre chamber before Charles Duke of Suffolke for that time high ſteward of England and the Lorde Chaunceler and other commiſſioners.

The Duke of Northfolke claymed to be Erle Marſhall and to exerciſe his office at that feaſt. The Erle of Arrondell claymed to be high Butler and to exerciſe the ſame: the Erle of Oxford claymed to be Chamberlayne: the Vicount Liſle claymed to be Panter: the Lorde Burgaine to be chiefe Larderer, and the Lorde Braye claymed to be Almoner, and Syr Henry Wiat knight claymed to be Ewer: All theſe noble perſonages deſired their offices with their fees. Beſide theſe the Maior of London claymed to ſerue the Quene with a Cup of Golde and a Cup of aſſay of the ſame, and that twelue Citezens ſhould attende on the Cupborde and the Maior to haue the Cup, and Cup of aſſay for his labor, which petition was allowed. The fine Ports claymed to beare a Canapie ouer the Quenes head the day of the coronation with foure guilt Belles, and to haue the ſame for a rewarde, which alſo to them was allowed. Diuers other put in petie claymes which were not allowed, becauſe they ſeemed onely to be done at the kings coronation. All this ſeaſon great puruiaunce was made of all maner of Vitailes, and Lordes, knightes and Squiers were ſent for out of all Countries, which came to

After that the kings highnesse had addressed his gracious letters to the Maior and commonaltie of the Citie, signifying to them that his pleasure was to solempnise and celebrate the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wyfe Quene Anne at Westminster the Whitsonday next ensuing, willing them to make preparation as well to fetch her grace from Greenewiche to the Tower by water as to see the Citie ordered and garnished with Pagiauntes in places accustomed, for the honor of her grace. When she should be conueyed from the Tower to Westminster, there was a common counsaile called, and commaundement was geuen to the Haberdashers (of which craft the Maior syr Stephen Pecock then was) that they should prepare a Barge for the Batchelers with a waster and a Foyst garnished with Banners and streamers, likewise as they vse to doe when the Maior is presented at Westminster on the morowe after Symon and Jude. Also all other crafties were commaunded to prepare Barges and to garnishe them not alonely with their Banners accustomed, but also to deck them with Targets by the sides of the Barges, and to set vp all suche seemely Banners and Bannorets as they had in their halles or could get meete to furnishe their sayde Barges, and euerye Barge to haue mynstrelsie, according to which commaundements great preparation was made for all thinges necessarie for suche a noble tryumph.

The Maior and the companies resort to Greenewiche and attended vpon the Queene to the tower.

The .xix. day of May the Maior and his brethren all in Scarlet, and such as were knightes had collers of Esses and the remnaunt hauing good Chaynes, and the counsayle of the Citie with them assembled at saint Marie hyll, and at one of the clock dissended to the Newstayre to their Barge, which was garnished with many goodly Banners and streamers, & richely couered, in which Barge were Shalmes, Shagbushes and dyuers other instruments, which continually made goodly armony. After that the Maior and his brethren were in their Barge seing that al the companies to ỹ number of fiftie Barges were readie to wayte vpon them. They gaue commaundement to the companies that no Barge should rowe neerer to another then twise the length of the Barge vpon a great paine. And to see the order kept, there were three light Wherryes prepared, and in euery one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order, after which commaundement geuen they set forth in order as hereafter is discribed.

First before the Maiors Barge was a Foyst or Waster full of ordynaunce, in which Foyst was a great Dragon contynually mouyng, and casting wilde fyre: and round about the sayde Foyst stood terrible monsters and wilde men casting fire, and making hideous noyses: Next after the Foyst a good distaunce came the Maiors Barge, on whose right hand was the Batchelers Barge, in the which were Trumpets and diuers other melodious Instruments. The deckes of the sayde Barge and the sailyardes and the top Castels were hanged with riche cloth of Golde and silke. At the forepart and the sterne were two great banners riche beaten with the armes of the king and the Quene, and on the top Castell also was a long streamer newely beaten with the sayde armes.

At three of the clock the Queene appered in riche clothe of Gold & entered into her Barge accompanied with diuers Ladies and gentlewomē, and incontinent incontinent the Citizens set forwardes in their order, their Musicians conningly playyng, and the Batchelers Barge goyng on the Queenes right hande, which she toke great pleasure to behold. About the Queenes Barge were many Noble men, as the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, the Erle of Wiltshire her father, the Erles of Arrondell, Darby, Rutland, Worcester, Huntyngton, Sussex, Oxford, and many Bishoppes and noble men every one in his Barge, which was a goodly sight to beholde. Shee thus being accompanied rowed toward the Tower, and in the meane waye the shippes which were commaunded to lye on the shore for lettyng of the Barges shot diuers peales of Gonnes, and or shee landed there was a marueilous shot out of the Tower as euer was harde there. And at her landing there met with her the Lorde Chamberlaine with the officers of armes and brought her to the king, which receyued her with louyng countenaunce at the posterne by the water side, and kyssed her, and then she turned back agayne and thanked the Maior and the citezens with many goodly wordes, and so entered into the Tower. After which entry the Citezens all this while houed before the Tower, makyng great melodie and went not a land, for none were assigned to lande but the Maior, the Recorder and two Aldermen. But for to speake of the people that stood on euery shore to behold the sight, he that sawe it not, will not beleue it.

The coronation of queene Anne.

On the next day being Whitson euen, the Queenes maiestie accompanied with a great number of Lordes and Ladies richly appointed, came through the Citie of London which was richely bewtified, and so passed to Westminster. And there in the middes of the hall she was taken out of her Charriott, and then she gaue her hartie thankes to the Lordes and Ladyes, and to the Maior and other that had geuen their attendaunce on her and so withdrew her selfe with a few Ladyes to the Whitehall to the king by water.

The next day beyng Sondaye, she was crowned with all the solempnity and honor, that euer Queene of this realme was, and was as royally serued. And so soone as dinner was done, which was almost six of the clock at night, the Quene priuely returned by water to the king beyng at ỹ white hall. Then two daies after were holden before the kings gate royal Justes. And on Wednesday, the king sent for the Maior & his brethren to Westminster, & there he himself gaue to them harty thanks, with many goodly wordes

On Midsommer day after, the Lady Mary the French Queene dyed in Suffolke, who was the late wyfe of Lewys the twelue, and after maryed to Charles Duke of Suffolke.

The christening of the Ladie Elyzabeth.

The seuenth day of September beyng Sunday, betweene three and foure of the clocke at after noone, the Queene was deliuered of a fayre Lady which day the Duke of Norffolke came home to the Christnyng, and for the Queenes good deliueraunce, Tedeum was song incontinently, and great preparation was made for the Christnyng: and the Maior and his brethren and .xl. of the chiefe of the Citizens, were commaunded to be at the Christning, the Wednesday folowing, vpon which day the Maior sir Stephen Pecocke, in a gowne of Crimosin Veluet, with his coller of SS, and all the Aldermen in Scarlette with Collers and Cheynes, and all the Counsaile of the Citie with them, tooke their Barge after Dinner, at one of the clocke, and the Citizens had another Barge, and so rowed to Greenewich, where were many Lordes, Knightes, and Gentlemen assembled. All the

the walles betwene the kinges place and the Friers, were hanged with Arras, and all the way strawed with greene Rushes: the Friers Church was also hanged with Arras. The Funt was of siluer, and stoode in the middes of the Church, three steppes high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuers Gentlemen with Aperns, and Towels about their neckes, gaue attendance about it, that no filth should come in the Funt, ouer it hung a square Canapie of Crimosyn Satten, fringed with golde, about it was a rayle couered with red Say: betwene the Quier and the bodie of the Church, was a close place with a panne of fire, to make the childe readie in: when all these things were ordered, the childe was brought to the hall, and then euery man set forward: first the cityzens two and two, then gentlemen, Esquires, & Chapelens, next after them the Aldermen, and the Maior, alone: next the Maior the kinges Counsaile, the kinges Chapell in Copes: then Barons, Bishops, Erles, then came the Erle of Essex, bearyng the couered Basons gilte, after him the Marques of Exceter with the Taper of Virgin wax, next him the Marques Dorset, bearyng the salt, behind him the Ladie Mary of Norffolke, bearyng the Cresom, which was verye riche of pearle and stone, the olde Duches of Norffolke bare the childe, in a Mantell of purple Ueluet, with a long traine furred with Armine. The Duke of Norffolke, with his Marshall rod, went on the right hand of the sayd Duches, and the Duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of Armes: the Countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the childes Mantell, and betwene the Countesse of Kent, and the childe, went the Erle of Wiltshire on the right hand, and the Erle of Darbie on the left hande, supportyng the sayd traine: in the middes ouer the sayd childe was borne a Canapie by the Lord Rothford, the Lorde Husee, the Lorde William Hauard, and by the Lord Thomas Hawarde the elder: After the childe folowed many Ladies, and gentlewomen. When the childe was come to the Church doore, the bishop of London met it with diuers Bishops, and Abbottes mitred, and began the obseruaunces of the Sacrament. The Godfather was the Lord Archbishop of Cantorbury: the Godmothers were the olde Duches of Norffolke, and the olde Marchionesse of Dorset Widowes, and the childe was named Elizabeth. And after that all thing was done, at the Church doore the childe was brought to the Font, and christned, a this done, Garter chiefe king at armes cryed alounde, God of his infinite goodnesse, send prosperous life and long, to the high and mightie Princes of England Elizabeth: and then the Trumpets blew, then the childe was brought vp to the Aultare, and the Gospell sayd ouer it: and after that immediately the Archbishop of Cauntorbury confirmed it, the Marchionesse of Exceter beyng Godmother, the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, gaue to the Princes a standyng Cup of golde, the Duches of Norffolke gaue to her a standyng Cup of golde, fretted with pearle: the Marchionesse of Dorset gaue three gilt Boules, pounced with a couer: and the Marchionesse of Exceter, gaue three standyng Boules graues, all gilt with a couer. Then was brought in Wafers, Comfites, Ypocras, in such plentie, that euery man had asmuch as he would desire. Then they set forwards, the trumpets goyng before in the same order, toward the kings place, as they did when they came thetherwarde, sauyng that the giftes that the Godfather, and the Godmothers gaue, were borne before the childe by foure foure persons, that is to say: First sir John Dudley, bare the gift of the Ladie of Excester: the Lorde Thomas Hayward the yonger, bare the gift of the Ladie of Dorcet: the Lorde Fitzwater, bare the gift of the Ladie of Norfolke, and the Erle of Worcester, bare the gift of the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and all the one syde as they went, was full of staffe Torches, to the number of fiue hundred, borne by the Garde, and other of the kinges seruaunts, and about the childe were borne, many other proper Torches borne by Gentlemen: and in this order they brought the Princes to the Queenes Chamber, and taryed there a while, and at the last the Dukes of Norffolke, and Suffolke, came out from the king, thankyng the Maior of London and his brethren, and commaunded them to geue all the other thankes in the kinges name: and from thence they were had to the Seller to drinke, and so went to there Barges.

About this season was espyed a newe found Saint, and holy Hipocrite, called the holy Mayde of Kent, which by the great labor, diligence, and paine takyng of the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and the Lord Cromwell, and one called mayster Hugh Latimer, a deuine (which shortly after was made Bishop of Worcester) the iugglyng and craftie deceipt of this Mayde, was manifested and brought to light: whereupon after diuers examinations, thee with al her adherentes, were in November brought to the starre Chamber: whose names were these, Elizabeth Barton, which was thee that called herselfe the holy Mayde of Kent, Richard Maister, priest, person of Iddington in the Countie of Kent, Edward Bocking, Doctor in Diuinitie, Monke of Cauntorbury, Richard Deryng, also Monke of Cauntorbury, Edward Thwaites Gentleman, Thomas Laurence, Register to the Archdeacon of Cauntorbury, Henry Golde, person of Aldermary, Bacheler of Diuinitie, Hugh Rich Frier Obseruaunt, Richard Risby, and Thomas Golde Gentleman. These all beeyng in the starre Chamber, before diuers of the kinges Counsaile, confessed their feyned hipocrisie, and dissimuled sanctitie, and trayterous purposes and intents, and they were there by the kings counsaile adiudged, to stand at Paules Crosse, where they with their atone hands, should seuerally deliuer eche of them to the preacher that should be appointed, a bill declaryng their subtile, craftie, and superstitious doynges. Which then the next Sunday after, they all aboue rehersed, standyng on a stage at Paules Crosse, made for that purpose did accomplishe: but for their treasons committed, the matter thereof was respited to the Parliament next folowyng, where all they aboue sayd, with other as after ye shall heere, were attainted by act of Parliament, and suffered death as traytors, by hangyng, drawyng, and quarteryng at Tyborne.

Elizabeth Barton the holy Mayde of Kent.

In September the king of Scottes, sent hys Commissioners to the towne of Newe Castell, where were for the kyng of Englande Commissioners, syr Thomas Clifford, and Doctor Magnus, and sir Raufe Elderkare. And first the Scottes without any long communication, demaunded great amendes, saiyng, that the Englishmen had robbed and spoyled them to their losse, and that greatly, and sayde that the kyng of England of his honor, must nedes make satisfaction, if he would be called honorable. Then it was answered, that notwithstanding the leagues, written, sealed and sworne, the Scottish nation woulde neuer kepe peace, insomuch, whyle we be here intreating, treating, your people are robbing: wherefore the king demaundeth of you, the goodes and prisoners taken contrary to the peace, wherfore we here deliuer you a writing, which the Scottes receyued, and at their next meeting they sayde, that the shyppes to them were lawfull prises, by reason that the Erle of Anguishe, was mayntayned in England, which is rebell to our king, and the Erle and you haue done to vs much skathe, and we haue taken a few shippes, in recompence of somme part of our great losses, which we maye not deliuer, and therfore we pray you demaunde them not: but here we deliuer you our booke, which amounteth to a greater somme by ten thousande marke. The English Commissioners receyued the booke, and in the same the Scottes demaunded, recompence for burning their townes, and destroying many of their strong Piles, aboue .xxiiij. which were destroyed from the .xxiiij. day of Aprill, in the last .xxiiij. yere of the king, to the .xxx. daye of Aprill. The Englishe Commissioners aunswered, that if the Scottes woulde sende to the king of Englande, they doubted not, but they should haue a good answere for the king of England bade them chose peace or warre: so they agreed to sende to both their kinges letters of their doynges, which in hast was done. And after much suite of the Scots part, when they had much demaunded, & litle or nothing was graunted, they then beyng wery of warre desired peace, which was concluded during both the kinges liues, and the .xx. day of Maie, in the next yere of the king folowing, it was openly proclaymed, to the great comfort & reioysing of all louers of peace.

A peace concluded with the Scottes.

The .xxiij. day of December, the Duke of Suffolke was sent by the kyng and his Counsayle, to Bugden beside Huntingdon, where the Lady Katherin Princes Dowager laye. For the king was aduertised, and had good proues of the same, that she of froward mind woulde consent neyther to the determination of the Vniuersities, nor yet to the whole conuocation of the realme, but beyng counsayled by a fewe Spanyardes, which had litle learning, did all that shee coulde to infringe the determination of the sayde Vniuersities and Clergy. Insomuch that she wrote to the Pope, and to other Potentates, to grieue the king and his realme, because he would not folow her minde, and breake the commaundement of God. Wherefore the kinges Counsayle motioned the king, that such as were about her, and moued her therto, should be put from her, for they thought it no reason, that she should haue such libertie to worke that thing, by the which the king and his realme, might haue detriment or damage. Wherefore the sayde Duke was sent to her, which shewed to her openly, Articles of her suytes to the Pope, and how she sought meanes to grieue the king and his realme, which hereafter she should not be suffered to do. For the same time was a Curse sent from the Pope, which accursed both the king and the whole realme, which Curse the bearer therof, beyng not belike the hardyest man that euer shewed himselfe in fronte of battayle, thought it a great deale more better for hym to bestow it without the kings dominons, and therefore set it vp in the towne of Dunkercke in Flaunders, where it was taken downe by William Locke Mercer of London. The Queene aunswered the Duke very highly and obstinately, with many high wordes, and sodainly in a fury she departed from him, into her priuie chamber and shut the doore. He seeyng that, brake all the order of the Queenes Court, and discharged a great sort of her house-holde Seruauntes, and yet left there a conuenient number, to serue her like a Princes. There was great lamentation among them that departed, but there was no remedy. Then they that remayned to serue her, were sworne to serue her as a Princes Dowager, and not as Quene, some sayd that they were sworne to her as Queene, and otherwise they would not serue, and so they departed. Other that were sworne to her as Princes, and remayned there, she them vtterly refused for her Seruauntes, wherfore she remayned with the lesse number of Seruauntes. The princes Dowager was verye heady and wilfull.

The king kept his Christmas at Greenewiche, with great solemnitie, and after Christmas began the parliament. In which parliament Elizabeth Barton called the holy Mayde of Kent, with all her ayders and abbetters, of whome ye haue heard before, was attaynted, and her great and greeuous offences appereth in the statute made in this present parliament and the one and twenty day of Aprill next following she with her adherents were drawne to Tiborne and there executed. A parliament

And at the place of execution, and the present time that she suffered she sayde these wordes, hether am I come to die, and I haue not bene the onely cause of myne owne death, which most iustly I haue deserued, but also I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at thys time here suffer: and yet to saye the truth I am not so much to be blamed, consydering it was well knowne vnto these learned men, that I was a poore wenche without learnyng, and therefore they might haue easily perceyued that the thinges that were done by me could not proceede in no such sort, but their capacities and learning coulde right well iudge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether fayned: but because the things which I fayned was profitable vnto them, and therefore they much praised mee and bare me in hande that it was the holy ghost, and not I that did them, and then I being puft vp with their prayses, fell into a certaine pride and foolishe phantasie with my selfe, and thought I might fayne what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which now I crye God and the kinges highnesse most hartely mercie, and desire all you good people to pray to God to haue mercie on me, and all them that here suffer with me.

In this parliament also was made the act of succession for the suretie of the crowne, to the which euerye person beyng of lawfull age shoulde be sworne vpon the payne expressed in that act, as in the same ye may most euidently see.

Monday the .xviij. day of Marche in the parliament time were solemnly receyued into London as Ambassadours from James the fist king of Scottes, the Bysshop of Aberdyne, the Abbot of Kynlos, and Adam Otterborne the kinges Atturney, with diuers Gentlemen on them attendaunt, which were brought to the Taylers hall and there lodged. And on the day of the Annunciation of our Lady they were brought to the kinges place at Westminster, where they shewed their Commission and Message, for the which the king appointed them dayes to counsayle. And shortly after commissioners were appointed as you shall heare.

The .xxx. daye of Marche the Parliament was proroged, and there euery Lorde and Burgesse and all other, were sworne to the act of succession and subscribed their handes to a Parchement fixed to the same othe. Thys Parliament was prorogued till the thirde day of Nouember next. After this, commissions were sent ouer all Englande to take the othe of all men and women to the act of succession, at which fewe repyned, except Doctor Iohn Fysher, syr Thomas Moore knight late Lorde Chauncelor, and Doctor Nicholas Wylson Parson of saint Thomas Apostles in London: wherfore these three persons after long exhortation to them made by the Bishop of Cauntorbury at Lambeth, and expresse deniall of them to be sworne, they were sent to the Tower where they remayned and were oftentimes mocioned to be sworne: but the Bishop and syr Thomas Moore sayde that they had in their writtings written the princesse Dowager Quene, and therfore they might not go against that, and the Doctor sayde that he in preaching called her Queene, which he would not with say, howbeit at length he was very well contented, and dissembled the matter and so escaped: But the other twaine stood against all the realme in their opinion.

In this yere it chaunced that two Marchaunt straungers fell in loue with a Harlot which was called Wolfes wyfe, and this Harlot had often haunted the straungers chambers. And so on a time the sayde Harlot appointed these straungers to come to Westminster, and shee had prepared for them a boate, in the which boate was but one man to rowe, which was a strong theefe, and in the ende of the boate lay Wolfe her husbande couered with a leather that boatemen vse to couer their Cushins wyth, and so these straungers sat them downe mistrusting nothing, and when thys boteman had brought them as farre as a place that is called the Turning tree, sodainely stepped vp the sayde Wolfe and with his dagger thrust the one of them thorowe, the other cryed out to saue his lyfe, and offered a great somme of money to the boateman and him to saue his life, but no prayers would be heard, nor mercie would they extende, but as cruell murderers without pittie slue the other also and bounde them face to face, and so threw them into the Thames in the aforesayde place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatly the Harlot Wolfes wyfe went to the straungers chambers, and tooke from thence so much as she could come by. And at the last she and her husbande as they deserued, were apprehended, arraigned and hanged at the foresayde turning tree, where she hanged stil & was not cut downe, vntill such time as it was knowne that beastly and filthy wretches had most shamefully abused her being dead.

The Lorde Dacres of the North.

The ninth day of July was the Lorde Dacres of the North arreigned at Westminster of high treason, where the Duke of Norffolke sat as iudge and high Stewarde of England. The sayde Lorde Dacres beyng brought to the barre with the Axe of the Tower before him, after his inditement read, not onely improoued the sayd inditement as false and maliciously deuised agaynst him and aunswered euery parte and matter therein contayned, but also so manly, wittily, and directly confuted his accusors which there were readie to auouche their accusations, that to their great shames, and to his great honour, he was founde that day by his peeres not guiltie, for the which vndoubtedly the commons exceedingly ioyed and reioyced at, insomuche as there was in the Hall at those wordes not guiltie, the greatest shoute and crye of ioye that the lyke no man lyuing can remember that euer he heard.

The

The .xiiij. day of August was a great fyer at Temple barre and diuerse houses brent. And the .xvi. day of the same moneth was burned the kinges stable at Charing crosse otherwise called the Mewse, wherein was brent many great Hozses and great stoze of hay. The Mewse

In this yere the thirde day of November the kynges highnesse helde his high courte of parliament, in the which was concluded and made many and sondzie good, wholsome, and godly statutes: but among all, one speciall estatute, which auctho|rised the kinges highnesse to be supzeme heade of the church of England, by the which the Pope with all his College of Cardinalles with all their Pardons and Indulgences was vtterly abholished out of this realme. In this parliament also was geuen to the kynges highnesse the first fruites and tenthes of all dignities and spiritu|all pzomotions. And in the ende of the same parliament the kinges maiestie most gracio|sly graunted (and willed it by the same parliament to be establyshed) his most gracious and generall free pardon. The Pope abholished. The first fruites and tenths g|ven to the king.

This yere also came in the great Admyzall of Fraunce: which Admyzall was honozably receyued, and at his departing was liberally rewarded.

In this time died the Erle of Kildare pzisoner in the Tower: And euen at the same time Thomas Fitzgarard hys sonne began to rebell agaynst the kyng and tooke all the kinges Ozdinaunce, and sent Ambassadours to the Emperour to haue intreated him to take parte with him. Also he slewe the Bishop of Deuelin and brent and robbed all such as would not obey him: But at the last he was appzehended and had as he deserued as after shall appeare. Thomas Fitzgarard rebelleth.

In the beginning of thys yere the Duke of Nozffolke and the Byshop of Ely went to Calice, and thether came the Admirall of Fraunce. 1534 26

And the .xix. day of June was three Monkes of the Charterhouse hanged, dzawen, and quartered at Tybozne, and their quarters set vp aboute Londō foz denyng the king to be supzeme head of the Church. Their names were Exmewe, Myddlemoze and Rudigate. These men when they were arreigned at Westminster, behaued themselues very stiffely and stubboznly, foz hearing their inditement red how trayterously they had spoken agaynst the kings maiestie his crowne and dignitie, they neuer blushed noz abashed at it, but very foolishly and hipocritically knowleged their treason which maliciously they auouched, hauing no learning foz their defence, but rather beyng asked dyuers questions, they vsed a malicious silence, thinking as by their examinations afterwarde in the Tower of London it did appere, foz so they sayde, that they thought those men which was the Lozde Cromwell and other that there sat vpon them in iudgement to be heretiques and not of the Church of God, and therefoze not wozthy to be eyther aunswered oz spoken vnto. And therefoze as they deserued, they receyued as you haue heard befoze. Exmewe Myddlemoze Rudigate.

Also the .xvij. day of the same month John Fysher Byshop of Rochester was behedded, and his head set vpon London bzidge. This Byshop was of very many men lamented, foz he was repozted to be a man of great learning and a man of very good lyfe, but yet wonderfully deceiued, foz he maintayned the Pope to be supzeme head of the Church, and denyed the kings tytle therein, who albeit he was learned, yea, and that very notably learned, yet John Fisher Bishop of Rochester behedded.

haue you heard howe he was deceyued with Elizabeth Barton that called her selfe the holy Mayde of Kent, and no doubt so was he in the defence of that vsurped authoritie, the more pitie.

Sir Thomas Moore beheaded.

Also the first day of July was sir Thomas Moze behedded for the like treason before rehearsed, which as you haue heard was for the denying of the kings Maiestie supremitie. This man being learned as you haue heard before, was Lorde Chauncelour of Englande, and beside his learning he had a great wit, and in talking verie pleasant and merie conceited, and that euen to his last howre: Insomuch as at his comming to the Tower, one of the officers demaunded his vpper garment for his fee (meaning his Gowne) and he answered, he should haue it, and toke him his Cap, saying it was the vppermost garmẽt that he had. Likewise, euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poze woman called to him and besought him to declare that he had certayn euidences of hers in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended she could not come by) and that he would intreat she might haue them agayne, or else she was vndone. He answered good woman haue patience a little while, for the king is so good vnto me that euẽ within this halfe houre he will discharge me of all businesses, and help thee himselfe. Also when he went vp the stayres on the Scaffolde, he desired one of the Shrieues officers to geue him his hande to helpe him vp, and sayde, when I come downe agayne, let me shift for my selfe as well as I can. Also the hangman kneeled downe to him asking him forgeuenesse of his death (as the maner is) to whome he sayde I forgeue thee, but I promise thee that thou shalt neuer haue honestie of the stryking of my head, my neck is so short. Also euen when he should lay downe his head on the block, he hauing a great gray beard, stroked out his beard and sayde to the hangman, I pray you let me laye my beard ouer the block least ye should cut it.

This yere in the time that the king went his progresse, which was to Glouceſter, and so Westwarde, the king of Scotes was installed at Wyndsore by the Lorde Erskyn his procurator. And in October folowyng Stephyn Gardiner Bysshop of Winchester was sent Ambassador into Fraunce, where he remayned three yeres after.

The king of Scots made knighte of the Garter.

In Nouember was a solempne Procession through the Citie of London of all the priestes and religious in and about the City, for the recouering of the French king to his helth. And the. viij. day of January folowyng, died the princes dowagar at Kimbalton, and was buryed at Peterborough.

The death of the Princes Dowager.

And in Februarie folowyng, was Queene Anne brought a bedde of a childe before her time, which was borne dead.

Queene Anne brought a bed before her time.

The fourth day of Februarie the king helde his highe Court of Parliament at Westminster, in the which was many good and wholesome statutes and lawes made and concluded. And in this time was geuen vnto the king by the consent of the great and fatte Abbottes, all religious houses that were of the value of three hundred Marke and vnder, in hope that their great Monasteryes should haue continued still: But euen at that tyme one sayde in the Parliament house, that these were as thornes, but the great Abbottes were putrifyed olde Okes, and they must needes folowe: and so will other do in Christendome quod Doctor Stokesley Bishop of London or many yeres be passed.

Abbeys of the value of three hundred Marks and vnder geuen to the king.

About

About this tyme sayth Sleydan, the king of England sent certaine Ambassadors into Germany to the Protestants to conclude a league with them, among the which Ambassadors was chiefe Edward Fore Bishop of Herford. And after great conference and long communication had, at the last it was agreed that the king and they were content to enter into league vpon these condicions: 1 First that the king should set forth the pure Doctrine of the Gospell which they professed at Alspurge, and maintaine the same with them in a lawfull Counsaile if any such shall be.

2 That neyther of them admyt the calling or place of a Counsaile, but by common assent: neuertheless if it may appere by certaine and manifest reasons that any such counsaile is like to be, as hath bene declared to Peter Paule, Uerger, the Bishops Legate, that it be not refused: But in case the Bishop continue his purpose, that then his enterprise be letted, and by open protestation to be refused.

3 And like as the king hath ioyned himselfe to their religion, so likewise to ioyne with them in league also, and to be called the Patrone and defender of the same.

4 That common opinion of the supremacie of the Bishop of Rome, to bee vtterly reiected for euer.

5 If any warre be attempted agaynst eyther part, for religion or other cause, that no ayde be geuen vnto him that inforceth the same.

6 That for the defence of the league, the king shall pay one hundred thousand Crownes, whereof the one halfe the Confederatours shall and maye employ when neede shall require, and the rest of their charges to be borne of their awne money which they shall contribute among them: But if the warre shall long endure, and the force of the enemy drive them to it: then the king to disburse two hundred thousand Crownes, forasmuch as they if the like chaunce should fortune, stand also bound, not onely to spend their goodes but their bloud and life also. And of this somme also, the lyke consideration to be had as before, and that it be not employed to any other vse, then to defend the league, and the remainder to be restored when the warre is finished.

7 That the Ambassadours shall write to the king hereof, and when they knowe his minde, to aduertise the Duke of Saxon, and Lantgraue Uan hesse thereof, that after a common Ambassade may be sent vnto him.

Now when the Ambassadors had sent these requests vnto the king they departed to Wyttenbergh. And shortly after came letters from the king of England to the Protestantes, purporting the kinges minde therein, and the Ambassadours do aduertise the Prince elector hereof. And the .xij. day of March at Wittenbergh, whether the Duke was at that tyme come, speaking first many thinges of the kinges great good will, the Ambassadors declare howe that the most part of the requestes do content him, if a fewe might be amended. And albeit that in England all thing is quiet, neyther is there any cause wherefore the king should feare any man, and if haply any cause hath beene, the same is now taken away by the death of his wyfe forsaken, nevertheless to recouer and mainteyn the true Doctrine, he doth not refuse to destray the somme of money which they requyre, so that the league go forward, and hereof he will treate more at large with their Ambassadors. And where they offer vnto him this honour, that he should be defender and patrone of the league, he geueth them great thankes, and acknowlegeth their good will. And although he vnderstand with how much enuy and displeasure, the same is annexed, yet for the common welthes sake, he could be content if they can agree vpon the first and second demaunde. For onelesse there be an vniformity in doctrine, he supposeth that this charge cannot be greatly to his honour: But he would chiefely wishe that the learned of his realme and theirs might be wholy of one opinion. And where he seeth well that the same will not be, onelesse certaine places of the confession and Apologie of their doctrine may before by priuate talke be something qualified: Therefore he desyreth them instantly to send their Ambassadors, and amongest them some one that is excellently learned, which may conferre with his Deuines of the whole doctrine and cerimonies, and determine the matter. And where he offereth himselfe so liberall vnto them, he requireth againe, that in case any man attempt warre against him: First they will ayde him eyther with fiue hundred horsemen, or else with. x. ships wel manned and furnished for foure monthes. Furthermore, that vpon his owne charges they shall prouide for him two thousand horsemen, and fiue thousand footemen.

Nowe when the Duke had heard the Ambassadors, he answered them that in asmuch as these thinges concerne not him alone, but his confoderes also, he will make them priuie vnto it, and vse their counsaile in the same.

But shortly after as will appere in the yere folowyng, the king hauyng condempned his wife Queene Anne of Adultery & incest, But (sayth Sleydan) vniustly as it is supposed and proued since, caused her head to be striken off, after she had borne him a daughter that bewtifull Ladie Elizabeth nowe Queene of England. And with her were executed certain Gentlemen of the kings priuie Chamber, Norreys, Weston, Brewton, and one Markes, which Markes cõtrary to his conscience, for hope of preferment, subscribed to a bil, whereby he condemned both himselfe, and all the rest. And he was prouoked therunto by the lord Admirall Fitzwilliams, that was after Erle of Southampton, who sayd vnto him, subscribe Markes, & see what will come of it, & he subscribed, and receyued therefore a reward vnlooked for. And also the lord Rochefort the Queenes brother, through the false accusation of the strumpet his wyfe, which afterwards suffered therfore accordyng to her desertes, was in lyke maner put to death. Which dolefull tragidie tooke cleane away the former purposed Ambassade that should haue bene sent into England.

On May day were a solempne Justes kept at Grenewich, and sodainly from the Justes the king departed hauyng not aboue. vj. persons with him, and came in the Euening from Grenewich to his place at Westminster. Of this sodain departyng many men mused, but most chiefely the Queene, who the next day was apprehended and brought from Grenewich to the Tower of London, where after she was arreigned of high treason, and condemned. Also at the same tyme was likewise apprehended, the Lord Rocheford brother to the said Queene, & Henry Norrys, Mark Smeton, William Brutton, & sir Fraunces Weston, all of the kings priuie Chamber. All these were likewyse committed to the Tower, and after arreigned & condemned of high treason. And all the Gentlemen were beheaded on the scaffold at the Tower hill: But the Queene was with a Swoorde behedded within the Tower. And these folowyng were the woordes that she spake the day of her death death which was the .xix. day of May. 1536.

The wordes of Queene Anne Bulleyn at her death.

Good Christen people, I am come hether to dye, for according to the lawe and by the lawe I am iudged to dye, and therefore I will speake nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speake any thing of that wherof I am accused and condemned to die, but I pray God saue the king and send him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler nor a more merciful prince was there neuer: and to me was euer a good, a gentle, and souereigne Lorde. And if any person will meddle of my cause, I require them to iudge the best. And thus I take my leaue of the world & of you all, and I hartely desire you all to pray for me. O Lord haue mercy on me, to God I cõmend my soule. And then she kneled downe saiyng: to christ I cõmend my soule, Iesu receiue my soule diuers times, till ỹ her head was stricken of with the sword.

Ladie Jane Seymer maried to the king.

The weke before Whitsontyde the kyng maryed Lady Jane daughter to the right worshypfull syr John Seymer knight, which at Whitsontide was openly shewed as Queene.

Lorde Thomas Hawarde committed to the tower.

In the parliament season Lorde Thomas hawarde without the kinges assent affied the Lady Margaret Douglas daughter to the Quene of Scottes and Neece to the king: for which presumpteous acte he was attainted of treason, and an act made for the like offendors, and so he dyed in the Tower, and she was long there as prisoner.

In the time of this parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy of the realme held a solempne conuocation at Paules Church in London, where after much disputacion & debating of matters they published a booke of religiõ intituled. Articles deuised by the kings highnesse &c. In this boke is specially mencioned but three Sacraments, with the which the Lincolnshiremẽ (I meane their ignorant priestes) were offended, & of that occasion depraued the kings doings. And this was their first beginning, as ye shal plainly here.

After this booke which passed by the kynges auctoritie with the consent of the Clergy, was published, certaine Iniunctions were that time geuen whereby a number of their holy dayes, was abrogated and specially such as fell in the Haruest time, the keping of which was much to the hinderaunce of the gathering in of corne, hay, fruite, and other such like necessarie and profitable commodities.

The insurrection in Lincolnshire.

These articles thus ordained and to the people deliuered. The inhabitauntes of the North partes beyng at that time very ignorant and rude, knowing not what true religion ment, but altogether noseled in superstition and popery, and also by the meanes of certayne Abbotes and ignorant Priestes not a litle stirred and prouoked for the suppression of certain Monasteries, and for the extirpation and abholishing of the Bishoppe of Rome now taking an occasion at this booke, saiyng see friendes now is taken from vs foure of the seuen Sacramentes, and shortly you shall lose the other three also, and thus the faith of holy Church shall vtterly be suppressed and abolished and therefore plainly they spred abroade and rayled great and shamefull slaunders onely to moue the people to sedicion and rebellion, and to kindle in the people hatefull and malicious mindes against the kinges maiestie and the maiestrates of the realme, saiyng, let vs fully bende our selues to the mayntenaunce of religion, and rather then to suffer it thus to decaye, euen to dye in the fielde. And amongest them also were to many, euen of the nobilitie that did not a litle prouoke and stirre vp the ignorant & rude people the more stifly to rebell and stande therein, faythfully promising them both ayde and succor against the king and their owne natiue countrye (like foolish and wicked men) thinking by their so doyng to haue done God high pleasure and seruice. There were also certayne other malicious and bulye persons who added Oyle (as the adage sayth) to the Fornace: These made open clamors in euery place where opportunitie serued, that Christen religion should be vterly violate, dispyssed and set a side, and that rather then so, it behoued and was the partes of euerye true Christen man to defende it euen to the death, and not to admyt and suffer by any meanes the fayth (in the which their forefathers so long and so many thousand yeres haue liued and cõtinued) now to be subuerted and destroyed. Amongest these were many priestes which deceyued also the people with many false fables & venemous lyes and imaginations (which could neuer enter nor take place in the hart of any good man, nor faithfull subiect) saiyng that al maner of prayer and fasting and all Gods seruice should vtterly be destroyed & taken away, that no man should marry a wife or be partaker of the Sacraments, or at the length should eate a piece of rost meate, but he shoulde for the same first pay vnto the king a certaine somme of money, and that they should be brought in more bondage and in a more wicked maner of life, then the Sarazins be vnder the great Turke. With these and such other like errors and slaunderous tales, the people thus instructed (or as I may trulier speake) deceyued and mocked, beyng to light of credyt, incontinent to the helpe and mayntenaunce of religion once established and confirmed, they stifly and stoutely did conspire and agree: And in a part of Lincolneshyre, first they assembled and shortly after, ioyned into an army, beyng (as it was supposed) of men apt and fitte for the warre, in number aboue twentie thousand.

False and slaunderous rumors.

Agaynst these trayterous rebelles, wyth all the haste and speede that might be (after he heard thereof) the kinges royall maiestie, in his owne proper person, furnished with a goodly and warlike armie, lacking nothing that to such a companie should appertaine, marched toward them. But these rebels hearing that his maiesty was present with his power and army royall, feared what would follow of this matter, and suche as were noble men and Gentlemen, that before fauoured them began to withdraw themselues, so that they were destitute of Capitaines, & at the last they in writing made certayne peticions to the kings maiestie, professing that they neuer intended hurt toward hys royall person. The kings maiestie receiued their peticions and made aunswere vnto them as followeth.

The kings aunswere to the rebels of Lyncolnshire

First we begin and make aunswere to the foure and fiue articles, because vpon them dependeth much of the rest, concerning choosing of counsaylors, I neuer haue red, heard, nor knowne, that princes counsaylors, and prelates should be appointed by rude and ignorant common people, nor that they were persons meete nor of habilitie to discerne and choose mete and sufficient counsailors for a prince: how presumpteous then are ye the rude commons of one shire, and that one of the most brute and beastly of the whole realme, and of the least experience to finde fault with your prince for the electing of his counsaylors and prelates, and to take vpon you contrarie to Gods lawe and mans lawe to rule your prince, whome ye are bounde by all

lawes to obey and serue with both your lyues, landes and goodes: and for no worldly cause to withstand: the contrarie whereof you like Traytors and rebelles haue attempted and not like true subiectes as ye name your selues.

As to the suppression of religious houses and Monasteries, we wyll that ye and all our subiectes should well knowe that this is graunted vs by all the nobles spirituall and temporall, of this our realme, and by all the commons in the same by act of Parliament, and not set forth by any counsaylor or counsaylors vppon there meere will and phantasie, as ye falsely would persuade our realme to beleue.

And where ye allege that the seruice of God is muche diminished, the truth thereof is contrarie, for there be no houses suppressed where God was well serued, but where moste vice, mischiefe and abhomination of lyuing was vsed, and that doth wel appere by there awne confessions subscribed with their awne handes in the time of their visitations, and yet we suffered a great many of them (more then we needed by the act) to stand wherein if they amende not their liuing, we feare, we haue more to answere for then for the suppression of all the rest. And as for the hospitalitie for the releife of the poore, we wonder ye be not ashamed to affirme that they haue bene a great releife of the poore people, when a great many of the most part hath not past foure or fiue religious persons in them, and diuers, but one which spent the substaunce of the goods of their houses in norishyng of vice, and abhominable lyuing. Nowe what vnkindnesse and vnnaturalitie may we impute to you and all our subiectes that be of that minde, that had leuer suche an vnthriftie sort of vicious persons, should enioye suche possessions, profites and Emolumentes, as growe of the sayde houses, to the maintenaunce of their vnthriftie life, then we your naturall prince, soueraigne Lord and king, which doth and hath spent more in your defences of our awne, then fiue times they be worth: As touchyng the act of vses, we maruayle what madnesse is in your brayne, or vpon what ground ye would take auctority vpon you to cause vs to breake these lawes and statutes, which by all the nobles, knightes, and Gentlemen of this realme (whome the same chiefely toucheth) hath bene graunted and assented to: seyng in no maner of thinges it toucheth you the base commons of our realme.

Also the groundes of all those vses were false, and neuer admitted by any lawe: but vsurped vpon the prince, contrarie to all equitie and iustice, as it hath bene openly both disputed and declared by all the wel learned men in the realme of England in Westminster hall: whereby ye maye well perceyue howe mad and vnreasonable your demaundes be, both in that and in the rest, and how vnmeete it is for vs and dishonorable, to graunt or assent vnto, and lesse meete and decent for you in such a rebellious sort to demaund the same of your prince.

As touchyng the fiftene which ye demaund of vs to be released, thinke ye that we be so faint harted, that perforce ye of one shire (were ye a great many mo) could compell vs with your insurrections and such rebellious demeanor to remit the same: or thinke ye that any man will or may take you to be true subiectes, that first make and shewe a louing graunt, and then perforce would compell your soueraigne lorde and king to release the same? the time of payment whereof is not yet come, ye, and seing the same will not counter vaile the tenth penie of the charges, which we doe and paily sustayne for your tuition and safegard: make you sure by your occasions of these your ingratitudes, vnnaturalnesse and vnkindnes to vs now administred, ye geue vs cause which hath alwayes beene as much dedicate to your welth as euer was king, not so much to set or studie for the setting forwarde of the same, seyng how vnkindly and vntruely ye deale now with vs, without any cause or occasion: and doubt ye not, though you haue no grace nor naturalnesse in you to consider your duetie of allegeaunce to your king and souereigne Lorde, the rest of our realme we doubt not hath: and we and they shall so looke on this cause, that we trust it shall be to your confusion, if according to your former letters you submit not your selues.

As touching the first fruites, we let you wit, it is a thing graunted vs by act of parliament also, for the supportation of parte of the great and excessiue charges, which we support and beare for the maintenaunce of your welthes and other our subiects: and we haue knowne also that ye our commons haue much complayned in times past, that the most part of our goods, landes and possessions of the realme, were in the spirituall mens handes: and yet bearing vs in hande that ye be as louing subiectes to vs as maye be, ye cannot finde in your hartes that your prince and souereigne Lord should haue any parte there of (and yet it is nothing preiudiciall vnto you our commons) but to rebell and vnlawfully rise against your prince, contrarie to the duetie of allegeaunce and Gods commaundement, Sirs remember your folies and traytrous demeanors, and shame not your native Countrie of England, nor offende no more so grieuously your vndoubted king and naturall prince, which alwayes hath shewed himselfe most louing vnto you, and remember your duetie of allegeaunce, and that ye are bound to obey vs your king, both by Gods commaundement and law of nature.

Wherefore we charge you eftsones vpon the forefayde bonds and paynes, that ye withdraw your selues to your awne houses, euery man, and no more to assemble contrary to our lawes and your allegeaunces, and to cause the procurers of you to this mischiefe, to be deliuered to our Lieftenaunts handes, or ours, and you your selues to submit you to such condigne punishment as we and our nobles shall thinke you worthy: for doubt you not else that we and our nobles cannot will suffer this iniurie at your handes vnreuenged, if ye geue not place to vs of souereigntie, and shewe your selues, as bounden and obedient subiects, and no more to entermeddle your selues from henceforth with the waighty affaires of the realme, the direction whereof onely appertaineth to vs your king, and such noble men and counsailors as we list to elect and choose to haue the ordering of the same, and thus we pray vnto almightie God, to geue you grace to doe your duties, to vse your selues towarde vs like true and faithfull subiectes, so as we may haue cause, to order you thereafter, and rather obediently to consent amongst you to deliuer into the handes of our Lieuetenaunt a hundred persons, to be ordered according to their demerites, at our will and pleasure, then by your obstinacie and wilfulnesse, to put your selues, your wiues, children, landes, goodes, and cattels, besides the indignation of God, in the vtter aduenture of totall destruction, and vtter ruine, by force and violence of the swoorde.

foresayde, made to their petitions, eche misbeusyng other who should be reputed to be the greatest medler, euen very sodainly they began to shrinke, and out of hand they were all deuided, and euery man at home in his owne house in peace: But the Capitaynes of these rebelles escaped not all clere, but were afterward apprehended, and had as they deserued: he that tooke vpon him as Capitaine of this rowte named himselfe Capitaine Cobler, but it was a Monke called Doctor Makerel, with diuers other, which afterward were taken and executed.

Doctor Makerell otherwise called Capitayne Cobler.

All these thinges thus ended, the Countrey appeased, and all thinges in quiet, the kinges maiestie retired, and brake vp his armye.

But see, euen within sixe dayes folowyng, was the king truly certified, that there was a newe insurrection made by the Northren men, which had assembled themselues into a houge and great armie of warlike men, & well appoynted both with Capitaynes, horse, harnesse, and artillary, to the number of fortie thousand men, which had encamped themselues in Yorkeshire: And these men had eche of them to other bounde themselues by their othe, to be faythfull and obedient to his Capitaine: they also declared by their Proclamations solemnly made, that this their insurrection, shoulde extende no farther but onely to the maintenaunce and defence of the fayth of Christ, and deliuerance of holy Church sore decayed and oppressed, and also for the furtheraunce aswell of priuate as publike matters in the realme touchyng the welth of all the kings poore subiectes. They named this their seditious and trayterous voyage, an holy and blessed Pilgrimage: they had also certaine Banners in the field, whereupon was painted Christ hangyng on the crosse on the one syde, and a Chalice with a painted Cake in it on the other syde, with diuers other Banners of like hipocrisie, and feyned sanctitie: the souldiors also had a certaine cognisaunce or badge, embrodered or set vpon the sleeues of there coates which was the similitude of the fiue woundes of Christ, and in the middest thereof was writtен the name of our Lord, and thus the rebellions garryson of Sathan, with his false and counterfeated signes of holinesse, set forth and decked themselues, onely to delude and deceyue the simple and ignorant people.

The Rebels named their enterprise an holy and blessed pilgrymage.

After that the kinges highnesse was credibly certified of this newe insurged resurrection, he makyng no delay in so waightie a matter, caused with all speede the Dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, the Marques of Exceter, the Erle of Shrewsbury with other, accompanied with his mightie and royall armie, which was of great power and strength, forthwith to set vpon the rebelles: But when these noble Capitaynes and Counsaylors approched the rebelles, and perceyued their number, and sawe how they were bent to battail, they practised with great pollicie to haue pacified al without bloud shedding, but the Northren men were so stiffe necked, that they would in no wise stoupe, but stoutely stoode & maintained their wicked enterprize, wherefore the Nobles aboue sayde perceyuyng and seeyng none other way to pacifie these wretched rebelles, agreed vpon a battaile, the battaile was appointed, and the day was assigned: but see, the same night which was the night before the daye of the battaile appoynted, fell a small rayne nothing to speake of: but yet as it were by a great miracle of God, the water which was but a very small foorde, and that men in maner the day before, might haue gone dyuided ouer, sodainly rose of such a height, deepenesse, and bredth, that the like no man that there did inhabite, could see that euer they saw it so afore, so that the day euen when the houre of battaile should come, it was impossible for the one army to come at the other.

After this appointment made betweene both the armies (disappointed as it is to be thought onely by God, who extended his great mercy, and had compassion on the great number of innocent persons, that in that deadly slaughter had like to haue bene murdered) could take no place: Then by the great wisedome and policie of the sayd Capitaynes, a communication was had, and a pardon of the kinges Maiestie obtayned, for all the Capitaynes and chiefe doers of this insurrection, and they promised that such thinges as they found themselues agrieued withall they should gently be heard, and their reasonable petitions graunted, and that their articles should be presented to the kinges Maiestie, that by his highnesse authoritie, and wisedome of hys Counsaile, all thinges should be brought to good order and conclusion: and with this order euery man quietly departed, and those which before were bent as hote as fire to fight, beyng letted thereof by God, went nowe peaceably to their houses, and were as colde as water. A domino factum est istud.

In this tyme of insurrection, and in the rage of hurly burly, euen when the kings army and the rebels were readie to ioyne, the kinges Banner beyng displayed, and the kinges Maiestie then lying at Windsore, there was a Boocher dwelling within fiue mile of Windsore, which caused a priest to preach, that all such as tooke parts with the Yorkeshiremen, whom he named Gods people, did fight and defend Gods quarell, and farther the sayd Boocher in selling of his meate, one did bid him a lesse price of a sheepe then he made of it, he answered nay by Gods soule, I had rather ꝑ good felowes of the North had it among them, & a score more of the best I haue: This priest and Boocher were accused to the kings maiestie Counsail of the treasons aboue said on the Monday in the morning, & the same day they were both sent for, which confessed their treasons, and so according to the law marshall, they were adiudged to die: and so the sayde Monday, they were both examined, condemned, and hanged, the Boocher was hanged on a new payre of Gallowes set on the Bridge ende before the Castel gate: and the priest was hãged on a tree at the foote of Windsore bridge.

This yere in December was the Thamys of London all frosen ouer, wherefore the kinges Maiestie with his beautifull spouse Queene Jane, roade throughout the Citie of London to Grenewich: And this Christmalle the king by his Messengers and Heraulds, sent downe to the North his generall pardons to all capitall offenders: and shortly after came Aske to London, and so to the Court to the king: this Aske was the chiefe Capitaine of the last rebellion in the North, and now both pardoned of the king, and hys grace receiued him into his fauor, and gaue vnto him apparell and great rewardes, but as after ye shall perceyue, Aske enioyed not the king his newe friendes kindnesse a yere and a day, and pitie it was that he had any fauour at all, for there liued not a beryer wretch aswell in person, as in condicions and dedes, specially agaynst his annoynted gouernor and souereigne Lord.

A great frost.

Aske a rebell of the North.

The thirde day of Februarie, was Thomas Fitz Garrad late Erle of Kildare, and fiue of his Uncles, drawen, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne, for for highe treason.

Also in the sayde Moneth, Nichol Mulgraue, Thomas Tildie, wyth other began a new rebellion at Kirbie Staphan in Westmerland, with. viij. thousand persons, and besieged the Citie of Carlile, from whence they were beaten, with the onely power of the Citie, and in their returnyng the Duke of Norffolke who then was made Lieutenaunt of the North, encountered with them, and tooke the Capitaynes, and according to the law martiall, arreigned threescore and fourtene of them, and hanged them on Carlile walles, but Mulgraue escaped. And in the same moneth of Februarie began yet another insurrection, by the entisement of sir Fraunces Bygod, a man no doubt that loued God, and feared his Prince, with a right obedient & louyng feare: but nowe beyng deceyued, and prouoked therewnto by false rebellious persons, it was his fortune to taste of the ende which appertayneth to rebelles: such are men when God leaueth them to their selues, and when they will enterprise the doyng of that thing which Gods most holy worde vtterly forbiddeth: This Bygod was apprehended and brought to the Tower of London, & this last rebellion began in Setrington, and in Pikeryn Leigh, and Scarborough.

A new rebellion in Westmerland.

Sir Fraunces Bigod.

Also in the latter end of this yere, the Lorde Darcy, Aske, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Bulmer and his wife, sir Thomas Percy brother to the Erle of Northumberland, sir Stephen Hamelton, Nicholas Tempest, Esquier, William Lomley, sonne to the Lord Lomley, began againe to conspire, although they before had euery one of them their pardons: and nowe they were all taken and brought to the Tower of London.

Robert Aske taken.

In this yere one Robert Packyngton, Mercer of London, a man of good substaunce, and yet not so rich as honest and wise, this man dwelled in Chepeside at the signe of the Legge, and vsed dayly at foure of the clocke Winter and Summer to rise and go to Masse at a Church then called saynt Thomas of Acres (but now named the Mercers Chappell) and one morning among all other, beyng a great mistie morning such as hath seldome bene sene, euen as he was crossing the streate from his house to the Church, he was sodaynely murdered with a Gonne, which of the neighbors was playnely heard, and by a great number of Labourers at the same time standing at Soper lane ende, he was sene go forth of his house, and also the clap of the Gonne was hard, but the dede doer was neuer espied nor knowne, but many were suspected, but none coulde be founde fawtie: howbeit it is trew, that forasmuch as he was knowne to be a man of great corage and one that both could speake and also would be heard: and that the same time he was one of the Burgesses of the Citie of London & had talked somewhat against the couetousnesse and crueltie of the Clergy, he was had in contempt with them, and therefore most like by one of them thus shamefully murdered, as you perceyue that Mayster Honne was in the syrt yere of the reigne of this king.

Robert Packyngton.

In June the Lorde Darcy and the Lorde Hosley were arreigned at Westminster before the Marques of Exceter, then high Stuard of Englande, and they were both found gylty and had their iudgement as in cases of high treason.

The Lorde Darcy, & lord Hosey condempned of high treason.

Shortly after were also arreigned sir Robert Constable, Sir Thomas

Percey, Sir Fraunces Bigod, Sir Stephen Hamelton, syr John Bulmer and his wife, which some reported was not his wife, but his paramour, also William Lomley, Nycholas Tempest, and the Abbotes of Jerney and Riuers, and Robert Aske, and all founde gyltie of high treason, and all put to death at Tiborne, sauing sir Robert Constable, which was hanged in chaines on Beuerley Gate at Hull; and Aske was also hanged in chaynes at Yorke on a Tower, and sir John Bulmers paramour was brent in Smithfield in London: And in the latter ende of June, was the Lorde Darcy beheded at Tower hill and shortly after was the Lord Hosley beheded at Lincolne.

Lord Cromwell made knight of the Garter.

This yere at the feast of saint George, was the Lorde Cromwell made knight of the Garter.

The birth of Prince Edward late our soueraigne Lord & king Edward the sixt.

In October on S. Edwards euen was borne at Hampton Court the noble Impe prince Edward, whose godfathers at the christening were ỳ Archbishop of Cantorburie, & the Duke of Norffolke & his Godmother the Lady Mary the kinges daughter, and at the bishopping was Godfather the Duke of Suffolke: At the birth of this noble prince was great fiers made through the whole realme, and great ioye made with thankes geuing to almightie God which had sent so noble a prince to succede in ỳ crowne of this realme. But Lorde what lamentation shortly after was made for the death of his noble and gracious mother Quene Jane, which departed out of this life the xiij. day of October next followyng: and of none in the realme was it more beautifier taken then of the kings maiesty himself, whose death caused ỳ king immediatly to remoue vnto Westminster where he mourned and kept himselfe close and secret a great while: and the eyght day of November ỳ corps of the Queene was caried to Windsore with great solempnitie, and there was buried in the middes of the Queere in the Castell Church: And at the same time was made in Paules a solempne Herce for her, where was a masse and dirigie, and in like maner was song a Masse and dirigie in euery parishe church in London.

Quene Jane departed.

Quene Jane buryed.

The kings maiestie kept his Christmasse at Greenewiche in his mourning apparell, and so was all the Court till the morrowe after Candelmas day and then he and all other chaunged.

Also this yere the Viscount Beauchamp was created Erle of Hertford and sir William Fitzwilliam high Admirall created Erle of Southampton.

Thys yere James king of Scottes maried the Lady Magdalene, the French kings eldest daughter.

In Maye there was a Frier called Frier Forest, one of the obseruant Friers, but he might haue bene more truelier named as after shall appere, an obstinate Frier, this obstinate Frier had secretly in confessions declared to many of the kings subiects that ỳ king was not supreme head & being therof accused & apprehended, he was examined how he could say ỳ the king was not supreme head of ỳ Church, when he himself had sworne to the contrarie, he answered that he toke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer consented therunto: at this answere the lords who examined him loked very straugely at the dissimulation of the Frier, but being farther accused of diuers heretical and dampnable articles, that he helde contrarie to the scripture of God, he was after sundrie examinations conuinced and confuted, and gladly submitted himselfe to abide the punishment of the Church: But vpon this his submission, hauing more libertie then before he had, as well to talke talke with whome he would, as also who that would to talke with him, certayne such outwarde men as he was so talked with him and so incensed him, that the outwarde Frier was so farre from his open submission as euer he was, and when his abiuration was sent him to read and looke vpon, he vterly refused it, and obstinately stood in all his heresies, and treasons before conspired. All gentle meanes that was possible to be sought for his reconciliation was had, but the more gentler that the maiestrates were to hym, the more obstinate was the Frier, and would neyther argue nor aunswere: wherefore iustly he was condempned, and after for him was prepared in Smithfield in London a Gallowes on the which he was hanged in chaines by the middle and armeholes all quick, and vnder the Gallowes was made a fyre, and so he consumed and brent to death. At his comming to the place of execution, there was prepared a great Skaffolde, on which sate the nobles of the realme, and the kings maiesties most honorable counsayle, onely to haue graunted pardon to that wretched creature, if any sparke of repentaunce would haue happened in him: there was also prepared a Pulpit where a right reuerend father in God and a renoumed and famous Clarke the Bysshoppe of Worcester called Hugh Latimer, declared to hym his errors and openly and manifestly by the scripture of God confuted them, and with many good and godly exhortations moued him to repentaunce, but such was his frowardnesse that he neyther would heare nor speake: And a little before the execution, a bouge and a great Image was brought to the Galowes, which Image was brought out of Wales, and of the Welshmen much sought and worshipped: This Image was called Daruell Gatheren, and the Welshemen had a prophesie that this Image should set a whole Forest a fyre, which prophesie now toke effect, for he set this Fryer Forest on fyre and consumed him to nothing. This Frier when he sawe the fyre come and that present death was at hande, caught holde vpon the ladder, which he would not let go, but so vnpaciently tooke his death, that no man that euer put his trust in God neuer so vnquietly nor so vngodly ended his lyfe: if men might iudge him by his outward man, he appered to haue little knowledge of God and his sincere truth, and lesse trust in him at his ending. Upon the Gallowes that he died on, was set vp in great letters these verses folowing,

Hugh Latymer Bishop of Worcester

Prophesye of Darnell Gatheren.

Dauid Daruell Gatheren,
As sayth the VVelshmen
Fetched outlavves out of hell.
Novv is he come vvith speare and shielde,

For in VVales he may not dvvell.

That vvilfully shall be dead.
In his contumacie,
The Gospell doth denie
The king to be supreme head.

In July was Edmond Coningsbye attaynted of treason, for counterfeating of the kinges Signe Manuell: And in August was Edward Clifford for the same cause attaynted and both put to execution as Traytors at Tiborne. And the Monday after Bartelmewday, was one Cratwell Hangman of London, and two persones more hanged at the Wrestling place on the backeside of Clerkenwell beside London, for robbing of a Booth in Bartelmew fayre, at which execution was aboue twentie thousande people as I my selfe iudged sayth Hall.

In this moneth of August, the king of Scottes maryed the Ladye Marye late Duches of Longuile. And in September by the ſpeciall motion of the Lorde Cromwell all the notable Images vnto the which were made any ſpeciall Pilgrimages and Offeringes, were vtterly taken away, as the Images of Walſingham, Ypſwiche, Worceter, the Lady of Wilſdon, with many other. And likewiſe the Shrines of counterfeated Saintes, as the Shrine of Thomas Becket and diuerſe other. And euen foorthwith by the meanes of the ſayd Cromwell all the orders of ſuperſtitious and begging Fryers, as White, Gray, Blacke, Auguſtine, Croched Friers, and likewiſe all the puling Nonnes, with their Cloyſters and Houſes were ſuppreſſed and put downe.

In this ſeaſon, ſute was made by the Emperor to the kinges maieſtie that he would take to wyfe the Duches of Myllayne, but in this matter the Emperors counſayle ſo dalied with the king that ſhortly he left of that ſuite: of the which breaking of with the Emperor, the Duke of Cleue heard, and therefore forthwith he made ſupte to the kinges maieſtie, for his fayre ſiſter the Lady Anne: vndoubtedly the Emperors counſayle thought by a cautell to haue brought the king to ſue to the Biſhoppe of Rome for a licence which thing the kinges maieſtie ſoone ſmelled and perceyued, whereabout they went.

The thirde day of Nouember were Henry Marques of Exceſter and Erle of Deuonſhire, and ſir Henry Poole knight and Lorde Mountagew and ſir Edward Neuell brother to the Lorde Burgany ſent to the Tower which three were accuſed by ſyr Gefferie Poole brother to the Lord Mountagew, of high treaſon, and the two Lordes were arreigned the laſt day of December, at Weſtminſter before the Lorde Awdeley of Waldon, Lorde Chauncellor, and then high Stewarde of Englande, and there founde giltie, likewiſe on the thirde daye after was arreigned Sir Edward Neuell, Syr Gefferey Poole and two Prieſtes called Croftes and Collyns, and one Holand a Mariner and all attainted, and the ninth day of January were the ſayde two Lordes and Sir Edward Neuell behedded at the Tower hyll, and the two Priſtes and Holand were drawne to Tiborne and there hanged and quartered, and Syr Gefferey Poole was pardoned.

The Lorde Marques of Exceſter and other accuſed and condemned of high treaſon.

On Aſhewedneſday were John Johnes, John Potter, and Wylliam Manering, hanged in the Princes Liueries, becauſe they were the princes Seruaunts, on the South ſide of Paules Churchyard for killing of Roger Cholmeley Eſquyre in the ſame place of malice pretenſed.

Alſo on the thirde daye of Marche, was ſir Nicholas Carew of Beddington, in the County of Surrey knight of the Garter, and Maiſter of the kinges horſe, before attainted of treaſon, behedded at the Tower hyll, wher he made a goodly confeſſion, both of his follye and ſuperſticious fayth, geuing God moſt harty thankes that euer he came in the priſon of the Tower, where he firſt fauored the life and ſweeteneſſe of Gods moſt holye worde, meaning the Bible in Engliſhe, which there he reade by the meane of one Thomas Philips then keeper of that priſon, but before he was a Citezen and Poyntmaker of London, which Philips two yeres before had bene there priſoner himſelfe, and ſore troubled as well by ſyr Thomas More as alſo by Doctor Stokeſley Biſhop of London, who often times examined the ſayd Philips, and layde many articles to his charge, but he ſo wiſely and coldely

The answers of king Henry the eyght for comming to the generall counsaile.

At this time the Pope sommoned a generall counsayle to be holden at Mantua. And hereunto king Henry in the name of him selfe & his Nobles publisheth a writting, saiyng that where there is a Counsayle called by the Bishop of Rome, the which he hath none authoritie to do, and called at such a time, when mortall warre is betweene the Emperor and the French kyng, and the place appoynted at Mantua, whether it is neyther safe nor commodious for all men to come. He in deede desyreth a Christian counsayle with all his heart, but vnto the Bishoppes counsayle, he will neyther come himselfe nor yet send his Ambassadors: for this is alwayes their fashion, that for their owne lucre sake, they will in such maner of assemblyes oppresse Chryst and his veritie: And for his part he wyll haue nothing to do with the Bishop of Rome, nor regardeth no more his decree, then the writing of any other Bishop: adding that counsailes were wont to be called by the authoritie of the Emperor and kinges, which maner ought to be restored especially at this tyme when the Bishoppe hath so many graue persons to accuse him. Yet neuertheless can he neyther be reprehended without the daunger of a mannes life, nor accused presently: but in a lawfull counsaile: neyther is their any prouision made for hym or his by safeconduite, although there were yet manifest daungers that should let him that he coulde not come: For it is no newes to the Bishoppes to falsifie their fayth, and to sprinkle and defile themselues with innocent bloud. And albeit it shoulde be lawfull for others to repayre thether, yet were it no safety for him, whom the Bishop hath layde wayte for, whom he hateth deadly, whom he seketh to bring in hatred with other kings, for none other cause assuredly, then for that his Tirannye is exiled out of his realme, and his yerely reuenues taken away, which thing in very dede he taketh in most euill part, & so much the worse for that he feareth lest other kings warned through his example, will hereafter do the like.

Sir Wyllam Paulet Lord Saint Iohn. Sir Iohn Russell, Lord Russell.

Bulwarkes made by king Henry the eyght.

The same time the king caused all the Hauens to be fortefied, and rode to Douer, and caused Bulwarkes to be made on the Sea coastes, and sent commissioners throughout all the realme, to haue his people muster: and at the same season on Easter daye, was there three score vnknowne shippes lying in the downes, wherefore all Kent arose, and mustered in harnesse the same daye.

Margaret Countesse of Salisburie.

The eyght and twentie daye of Aprill, began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margaret Countesse of Salisburie, Gertrude wyfe to the Marques of Exceter, Reignolde Poole Cardinall, brother to the Lorde Mountagew, syr Adrian Foskew, Thomas Dingley knight of saint Johnes, and diuers other were attainted of highe treason, which Foskew and Dingley were the tenth day of July behedded.

Cardinall Poole.

The kinges highnesse which neuer ceased to studie and take payne both for the aduauncement of the common welth of this his realme of Englande, of the which he was the onely supreme gouernor and head, and also for the defence of the same, was lately enformed by his trustie and faythfull frendes,that the cankard and cruell serpent the Bishop of Rome, by that Archetraytor Reignolde Poole, enemie to Gods worde, and his naturall Countrie,had moued and stirred diuers great Princes and Potentates of Christendome to inuade the realme of Englande, and vtterly to destroye the whole nation of the same: wherfore his Maiestie in his awne person,without any delay tooke very laborious and painfull iournayes towardes the sea coastes. Also he sent diuers of his nobles and Counsaylors to viewe & searche all the Portes and daungers on the coastes, where any meete or conuenient landyng place might be supposed, aswell on the Borders of England,as also of Wales. And in all such doubtfull places,his highnesse caused diuers and many Bulwarkes,and fortifications to be made. And further his highnesse caused the Lorde Admirall Erle of Southhampton to prepare in readinesse shippes for the sea,to his great cost and charges.

Bulwarkes made.

And beside this,to haue all his people in a readinesse, he directed hys Commissions thorowghout the realme to haue his people mustered, and the harnesse and weapons seene and viewed,to the entent that all things should be in a readinesse,if his enemies would make any attempt into this realme: And amongest other, one Commission was directed to the right worshipfull sir Thomas Forman knight, Maior of London,and his brethren, for to certifie all the names of all men betweene the ages of. lx. and. xvj. and the number of harnesses, weapons,with their kinds and diuersities: Wherupon the sayde Lorde Maior and his brethren, euery one hauyng with them one of the Counsaile or learned men of the Citie repayred to their wardes, and there by the othe of the common counsaile and Constables of the same warde tooke the number of the men, harnesses, and weapons, accordyng to theyr Commission. And after that they had well viewed their Bookes, and the number of the persons, they thought it not expedient to admitte the whole number of such as were certified for hable and apt persons for to muster: Wherefore then they assembled themselues againe, and chose out of the most hable persons,and put by the other,and specially all such as had no harnesse,nor for whom no harnesse could be prouided. But when they were credibly aduertised by the kinges Counsaylor Thomas Lord Cromwell knight of the noble order of the Garter Lorde priuie Seale (to whose prudence and goodnesse the Citie was much bounden) that the king himselfe would see the people of the Citie Muster in a conuenient number, and not to set forth all their power,but to leaue some at home to keepe the Citie. Then eftsones euery Alderman repayred to his ward, and there put aside all such as had Jackes,coates of Plate, coates of Mayle,and Briganders,and appointed none but such as had white harnesse, except such as should beare Morishe pykes,which had no harnesse but sculles: and they appointed none but such as had white harnesse,neyther did they admit any that was a straunger, although they were Denizens. When it was knowen that the king would see the muster, Lord how glad the people were to prepare,and what desyre they had to do their Prince seruice, it woulde haue made any faythfull subiecties heart to haue reioyced. Then euery man beyng of any substaunce prouided himselfe a coate of white Silke, and garnished their Basenets with tunes lyke Cappes of Silke set with Ouches, furnished with Cheynes of Golde and feathers: other gylted their Harnesse, their Halbardes,and Pollaxes.

The great Muster in London.

Some,

Some, and especiall certaine Goldsmithes had their breast plates, yea and their whole harnelle of syluer bullion. The Constables were all in Iozmets of white Silke, with Cheynes, and Battell Axes. The meaner sozt of people were all in coates of white cloth curiously trymmed with the Armes of the Citie before and behinde. The Lozde Maioz himselfe was in a fayze Armoz the cresles thereof were gylt, and ouer that a coat of black Uelnet with halfe sleeues, and so was sir Roger Cholmley knight Recozder of London, and al the other Aldermen and Shirifes, and suche as had bene Shirifes, all well mounted on stirryng hozses richely trapped and couered, with Battelaxes in their handes, and Maces and Chaynes about theyz neckes. The Lozde Maioz had foure footemen all in whyte Sylke, cut, ruffed, and pounced: he had also two Pages well mounted on stirryng Coursers, richely trapped and appareled in coates of Crimosyn Uelnet, and cloth of Golde paled, with Chaynes of Golde, the one bearyng his helme, and the other his Axe. He also had .xbj. tall men on foote with gylt Halbardes, whose Dublets were white sylke, and hosen, dublets, and shoes all white, cut after the Almaine fashion, puffed and pulled out with red sarcenet, euery one hauing a white leather Jerkin all to cut, and Chaynes about their neckes, with feathers and Bzooches on their Cappes. The Recozder and euery Alderman had about him foure Halberdes trymmed warlyke.

The Chamberlayne of the Citie, and the Councellozs of the same and the Aldermens Deputies, which were appoynted to be Wyffelers on hozsebacke, were all in white Dammaske Coates on their harnelle, mounted on good hozses well trapped, with great Chaynes about their neckes, and pzoper Jauelyns oz Battelaxes in their handes, and Cappes of Uelnet richely decked.

The Wyffelers on foote, foure hundzed pzoper and light persons all appareled in white Silke oz Jerkyns of leather cutte, with white Hose and shooes, euery man hauyng a Jauelyn oz Slaughswozd to kepe the people in array and Chaynes about their neckes, and white feathers in their Cappes.

The Minstrels were all in white, with the armes of the Citie, and so was euery other person at this Muster without any diuersitie, sauyng the Lozde Maioz, the Recozder and his bzethzen, who had Crosles of Uelnet oz Satten pyzled with golde.

The Standard bearers were the talleft men of euery warde, foz whom were made .xxx. new Standardes of the deuise of the Citie besyde banners.

When euery thing was pzepared, euery Alderman mustered his owne warde in the fieldes, viewyng euery man in his harnelle, and to cause such as could shote, to take Bowes in their handes, and the other Billes oz Pykes.

The .viij. day of May, accozdyng to the kinges pleasure, euery Alderman in ozder of battaile with his warde came into the common field at Mile ende, and then all the Gonnes seuered themselues into one place, the Pykes in another, and the Bowmen in another, and likewise the Billmen, and there rynged and snayled, which was a goodly sight to beholde: foz all the fieldes from white Chapell to Myle ende, and from Bednall Greene to Ratclyffe, and to Stepney were all couered with harnelle, men, and weapons, and in especiall the battaile of Pykes seemed to be a great Fozrelt. Then euerye part was deuided into thzee partes, the Pykes in thzee partes, and so the other.

other. Then were appoynted three battayles, a foreward, middleward, and rereward.

The order of the Muster in goyng.

About.viij. of the clocke in the mornyng marched forward the lyght peces of ordynaunce, with stone and powder, after them folowed the Drōmes, and Fyffes, and immediately after them a Guydon of the armes of the Citie. Then folowed maister Sadler Capitaine of the Gunners, vppon a good horse in harnesse, and a coate of Veluet with a Chaine of Golde, and foure Halbardes about him appareled as before is rehersed. Then folowed the Gunners foure in a ranke, euery one goyng fiue foote a sunder, euery mans shoulder euen with another, which shot altogether in diuers places verye cherefully, and especially before the kinges Maiestie, which at that time sate in his new gate house at his Palace at Westminster, where he vewed all the whole company: In like maner passed the second and third battailes, all wel and richly appoynted. They passed as is sayd, the formost Capitaine at. ix. of the clocke in the mornyng by the little Conduit entryng into Paules Church yarde, and so directly to Westminster, and so through the Sanctuary, and round about the Parke of Saint James, and so vp into the field, and came home through Holborne: and as the first Capitaine entered againe to the little Conduite, the last of the Muster entered Paules Churchyard, which then was foure of the clocke at after noone. The number was. xv. thousand, beside Wyffelers and other wayters.

In August the great Onele and Odonele entered into the Englishe pale in Irelande, and brent almost twentie myle within the same: wherefore the Lorde Grey then Deputie there, assembled a great power and met with them the. xxv. day of August and put them to flight: And therefore the king sent ouer fiue hundred fresh souldiours to ayde his deputie.

Ambassadors sent out of Germanie for the conclusion of a mariage betwene the king and the Ladie Anne of Cleaue.

In the ende of September the. xvj. day of that moneth came to London Duke Frederyke of Bauyre Countie of Palantine or Palsgraue of the Ryne, and the. xviij. day came to London, the Marshall of Duke John Frederick prince Electour of Saxony, and the Chauncelor of William Duke of Cleue, Gulycke, Gelder and Berry: the Palsgraue was receyued and conducted to Wyndsore by the Duke of Suffolke: & the other were accompanied with other nobles, and the. xxiij. day of the same moneth they al came to Wyndsore, where eyght dayes they continually were feasted and hunted, with all pleasure that might be shewed vnto them: and the Palsgraue shortly departed and was honorably rewarded: and at that season was concluded the mariage betwene the king and the Lady Anne, sister to Duke William of Cleue, and great preparation was made for the receiuyng of her.

Hugh Feringdon, Rugge, Onyon.

The. xiiij. day of November Hugh Feringdon Abbot of Redyng and two Priestes, the one called Rugge, and the other Onyon, were attaynted of high treason, for denyng the king to be supreme head of the Church, and were drawne, hanged and quartered at Reding. This Abbot was a stubborne Monke and vtterly without learning. The same day was Richarde Whityng Abbot of Glascenbury likewise attaynted and hanged on Tower hill beside his monasterie, for the sayde case and other great treasons, which also was quartered: and the first daye of December was John Beche Abbot of Colchester put to execution for the same confederacie and treason.

Richard whityng Abbot.

John Beche Abbot.

In December were appointed to wayte on the kinges highnesse person fiftie fiftie Gentlemen called Pencioners or Speares, lyke as they were in the first yere of the king. Pencioners.

The.xj.daye of December at the Turnepike on this side Graueling was the Lady Anne of Cleue receyued by the Lorde Lisle, Deputie of the towne of Calice, & with the speares and horsemen belonging to the retinue there, all beyng freshe and warlike appareled, and so marchyng toward Calice a mile and more from the towne met her Grace the Erle of Southampton great Admirall of Englande, and apparelled in a Coate of purple Velvet cut on cloth of Golde, and tyed with great Aglets and Trefoiles of gold, to the number of foure hundred, and baudrick wise he ware a chayne, at the which did hang a Whystell of Golde set with riche stones of a great value. And in his companie thirtie Gentlemen of the kings houshold verie richely appareled with great and massy chaynes, and in especiall syr Fraunces Bryan, and syr Thomas Seymers chaynes were of great valure and straunge fashion. Beside this the Lorde Admirall had a great number of Gentlemen in blewe Velvet and crymosyn Sattyn, and hys yomen in Damnask of the same colours, and the Marryners of his ship in Sattyn of Bridges, both coates and sloppes of the same colours, which Lorde Admirall with lowe obeysaunce welcomned her, and so brought her into Calice by the Lanterne gate, where the ships lay in the hauen garnished with their banners, pencels and flagges, pleasauntly to beholde. And at her entrie was shot such a peale of Gonnes, that all the retinue much marueyled at it. And at her entrie into the towne, the Mayor of the towne presented her with an hundred Marke in golde. And before the Staple hall stood the Marchaunts of the Staple well apparelled, which likewise presented her with an hundred soueregnes of Golde in a riche Pursse, which hartely thanked them, and so she roade to the kings place called the Checker, and there she laye fiftene dayes for lack of prosperous winde. During which time goodly iustes and costly bankets were made to her for her solace and recreation. And on saint Johns daye in Christmas, she with fiftie sayle toke passage about none and landed at Deele in the downes about fiue of the clock, where sir Thomas Cheiney lord Warden of the Portes receyued her, and there shee tarryed a space in a Castell newely built, and thether came the Duke and Dutchesse of Suffolke, and the Bysshop of Chichester, with a great number of knightes and Esquires and Ladies of Kent and other which welcomned her grace, & so that night brought her to Douer Castell, where she rested till Monday: on which day for all the stormе that then was she marched towarde Cauntorburie, and on Baram downe met her the Archebishop of Cauntorbury accompanied with the Bishop of Ely, saint Asse, saint Dauyes and Douer, and a great companie of Gentlemen well apparelled, and so brought her to saint Austens without Caunterburie, where she lay that night: and on the next daye shee came to Sittyngburne and there lodged that night. And as shee passed towarde Rochester on Newe yeares euen on Reynam downe, met her the Duke of Norffolke and the Lorde Dacre of the South, and the Lorde Mountioye with a great company of knights and Esquires of Norffolke and Suffolke, and the Barons of the Exchequer, all in coates of Velvet with chaynes of Golde, which brought her to Rochester, where shee laye in the Palace all Newe yeares day. On which day the king which sore desired to see her grace accom-accompanied with no more then eyght persons of his priuie chamber, and both he and they all apparelled in Marble coates priuily came to Rochester, and sodaynly came to her presence, which therwith was somewhat astonied: but after he had spoken and welcommed her, shee with most gracious and louing countenance and behauior him receyued and welcomed on her knees, whome he gently toke vp and kissed: and all that afternone commoned and deuised with her, and that night supped with her, and the next day he departed to Grenewiche, and she came to Dartford.

On the morowe beyng the thirde day of January, and Saturday in a fayre playne on blackheth, more neerer the foote of shooters hill, then the ascendent of the hill called blackheth hill, was pitched a riche tent of cloth of Golde and dyuers other tentes and pauilions, in the which were made fyres and perfumes for her and suche Ladies as should receyue her grace: and from the tentes to the Parke gate of Grenewich were all bushes and firres cut downe, and a large and ample waye made for the shewe of all persons. And first next to the parke pale on the East side, stoode the Marchaunts of the Stilyard: and the West side stood the Marchaunts of Iean, Florence and Uenice, and the Spaniardes in coates of Ueluet. Then on both sydes of the waye stood the Marchauntes of the Citie of London and Aldermen with the counsaylors of the sayde Citie to the number of a.C.lx. which were mixed with the Esquires: Nexte vpward towarde the tentes stood knights: than the fiftie gentlemen Pencioners, and all this sort were apparelled in Ueluet and chaines of Golde, truely accompted to the number of twelue. C. and aboue, beside them that came with the king and her grace, which were sixt hundred in Ueluet coates and chaines of Golde. Behind the Gentlemen stood the seruyng men in good order, well horsed and apparelled, that whosoeuer had well viewed them might saye that they for tall and comely personages and clene of lymme and body, were able to geue the greatest prince in Christendome a mortall breakefast if he were the kings enimie: And of this sort the Gentlemen appertayning to the Lorde Chauncellor, the Lorde priuie Seale and the Lorde Admirall and diuers other Lordes, beside the costly iueries and comely horses, bare chaynes of golde.

Pencioners.

Thus was the lane ordered in rankes, from the Parke gate towarde the crosse on the heth, which was betweene the rankes and the tentes, and in this order they continued till the king and shee were returned.

About twelue of the clock her grace with all the company which were of her awne nation to the number of a hundred horse, accompanied with the Dukes of Norffolke and Suffolke, the Archebishop of Caunterburie and other Bysshops, Lordes and knightes, which had receyued and conueyed her as you haue heard before, came downe shooters hill toward the tentes, and a good space from the tentes met her the Erle of Rutlande her Lorde Chamberleyn, syr Thomas Denyce her Chauncellor, and all her counsaylors and officers, amongst whom Doctor Day apoynted to be her Almoner made to her an eloquent oration in Latine, presenting to her on the kinges behalfe all the officers and seruauntes: which oration was answered vnto by the Duke her brothers secretorie there beyng present: which done, the Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to the Queene of Scots, the Ladie Marques Dorset, daughter to the Frenche Queene beyng Meetes to the king, and the Ducheſſe of Richemond, and the Counteſſe of Rutlande and Oxenford with diuers other Ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of.lxb. mulers and welcomed her grace, which alighted out of her Chariot, in the which ſhe had ridden all her long iourney, and with moſt goodly demeanor and louing countenaunce gaue to them hartie thanks and kiſſed them all, and after all yet counſaylors and officers kiſſed her hande, which done, ſhe with all the Ladies entered the tents, and there warmed them a ſpace.

When the king knew that ſhee was arriued in her tent, he with all diligence ſet out through the parke. And firſt iſſued the kings Trompets, then the kings officers beyng ſworne of his counſayle, next after them followed the gentlemen of the kinges priuie chamber, ſome apparelled in coates of Veluet embroidered: other had their coates garded with chaynes of Golde, verie riche to beholde, which were well horſed and trapped: after them enſued Barons, the yongeſt firſt, and ſo Sir William Hollys knight Lord Maior of London roade with the Lorde Par beyng yongeſt Baron. Then folowed Biſhoppes apparelled in black Sattin. Then immediatly folowed the Erles, and then Duke Philip of Bauier and Countie Palantine of the Rhyne, richely apparelled with the liuerey of the Toyſant or Golden Fleece about his necke. Then followed the Ambaſſadours of the Frenche king and the Emperour, next folowed the Lorde Priuie Seale, Lorde Cromwell, and the Lord Chauncellor: then Garter king of Armes, and the other Officers of Armes and the Seriauntes at Armes gaue their attendaunce on euery ſide of the Lordes: which Lordes for the moſt part were apparelled in purple veluet, the Lorde Marques Dorcet in the ſame ſuyte bare the kings ſword of eſtate. After him a good diſtance folowed the kings highneſſe mounted on a goodly Courſer, trapped in rich cloth of Gold trauerced latice wiſe ſquare, all ouer embraudered with Golde of Dammaſke, pyrled on euery ſyde of the embraudery, the buckles and pendentes were all of fine Gold. His perſon was apparelled in a coate of purple Veluet, ſomewhat made like a frocke, all ouer embraudered with flatte Golde of dammaſke with ſmall lace myred betweene, of the ſame golde, and other laces of the ſame ſo goyng traverſe wiſe, that the ground litle appered: about which garment was a riche garde very curiouſly embraudered, the ſleeues and breſt were cutte, lined with cloth of golde, and tyed together with great buttons of Diamondes, Rubies, and Orient Perle, his ſword and ſworde gyrdle adorned with ſtones and eſpeciall Emerodes, his night cappe garniſhed with ſtone, but his bonnet was ſo rich of Iuels that few men could valew them. Beſide all this he ware in baudricke wiſe a coller of ſuch baliſtes and Perle that few men euer ſaw the like: and about hys perſon ranne ten footemen all richely apparelled in Goldeſmithes worke. And notwithſtanding that this riche apparell and precious Iuels were pleſaunt to the nobles and all other beyng preſent to beholde, yet his Princely countenaunce, hys goodly perſonage and royall geſture ſo farre exceeded all other creatures beyng preſent, that in compariſon of his perſon, all his ryche apparell was litle eſteemed. After him followed his Lorde Chamberleyne, then came Syr Anthony Browne Maiſter of his Horſe, a goodly Gentleman and a comly perſonage, well horſed, trapped, and richly apparelled, leading the kings horſe of eſtate by a long reigne of Golde, which horſe was trapped in maner lyke a barde with crimosin veluet and satten, all ouer embrodered with golde after an antyke fashion, very curiously wrought. Then folowed the pages of honor in coates of rich tinsell and crimosyn Uelvet paled, ryding on great Coursers all trapped in crimosyn Uelvet, embrodered with new deuises and knots of golde which were both pleasaunt and costly to behold. Then folowed syr Anthony Wyngfield Capitayne of the Gard, and then the Gard well horsed and in riche cotes. In this order the king rode to the last ende of the ranke, where the speares or Pencioners stood: and there euery person that came with the king, placed himself on the one side or the other, the king stading in the midst.

When her grace was aduertised of the kinges comming, she issued out of her tent beyng apparelled in a riche gowne of cloth of golde reysed, made round without any trayne after the Dutch fashion, and on her head a kalle, and ouer that a round Bonnet or cappe set full of Orient Pearle of a very proper fashion, and before that shee had a coznet of blacke Uelvet, and about her necke shee had a partelet set full of rich stone which glystered al the field. And at the dore of the Tent shee mounted on a fayre Horse richly trapped, with her footemen about her in Goldesmythes worke embrodered with the blacke Lion, & on his shoulder a Carbuncle of golde, and so she marched toward the king: which perceyuing her to approche came forewarde somwhat beyond the Crosse on blacke Heth, and there paused a litle in a fayre plate till shee came nerer: then he put of his Bonnet, and came forward to her, and with most louely countenaunce and princely behauiour saluted, welcommed and embraced her to the great reioysyng of the beholders: and she likewise not forgetting her dutie, with most amyable aspect and womanly behauiour receyued his grace with many swete words and great thanks and praisings geuen to hym. And while they two were thus commoning, the fiftie Pencioners and the Garde departed to furnish the Courte and Hall of Greenewiche. And when the king had talked with her a litle while, he put her on his right hande, & so wyth their footeuen they rode as though they had bene coupeled together. O what a sight was this to see so goodly a Prince and so noble a king to ryde with so fayre a Lady of so goodly a stature and so womanly a countenance, and in especiall of so good qualities, I thinke no creature could see them but his heart reioysed.

Now when the king and shee were met and both their companies ioyned together, they returned through the rankes of the knightes and Esquyers which stoode still all this while and remoued not, in this order: First her Trompettes went forward, which were twelue in number beside two Kettle Drommes on horsbacke, then followed the kinges Trompettes, then the kinges Councellors, then the Gentlemen of the priuie chamber, then the Gentlemen of her Graces countrey in coates of Uelvet, all on great horses: after them the Maior of London in crimosin velvet with a riche coller, coupled with the yongest Baron, then all the Barons, next following Bishoppes then Erles with whom rode the Erles of Ouersteyne and Waldocke of her countrye, then Dukes and the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and Duke Philipe of Bauire, next followed the Ambassadors, then the Lorde Priuieseale and the Lorde Chauncellor, then the Lord Marques with the kings sword, next followed the king himselfe equally with his fayre Ladye, and behinde him rode syr Anthony Brown with the kinges horse of estate as you heard before,and behinde her rode Sir John Dudley Mayster of her horses, leading her spare palferay trapped in rich Tissue downe to the grounde: after them followed the Henremen or Pages of honor, then followed the Ladye Margaret Douglas, the Ladye Marques Dorcette, the Dutchesse of Richmounde and Suffolke, the Countesses of Rutlande and Hertforde, and other Countesses: Then followed hir Graces Chariot in the which she rode all her iourney, well carued and gilte with Armes of her countrey curiously wrought and couered with cloth of golde,all the horses were trapped with blacke veluet,and on them rode Pages of honor in coates of veluet, in the which Chariot rode three auncient Ladies of her countrey: nexte after the Chariot followed sixe Ladies and Gentlewomen of her Countrey all richely apparaled with Cappes set with Perle, and great Chaynes of dyuers fashions, after the vsage of their Countrye, which were very fayre of face,and with them rode six Ladyes of England well besene. Then folowed another Chariot likewise gilt, and furnished as the other was: after that Chariot folowed ten Englishe Ladies well appareled, next them another Chariot all couered with black cloth,and in that foure Gentlewomen which were her Graces Chamberers: then folowed all the remnant of the Ladies Gentlewomen, and Maydens in a great number, which did weare that day French whodes: last of all came another Chariot all blacke, with three Lauders appertaynyng to her grace: next after folowed a Horslitter of cloth of Golde and Crimosyn Veluet vpon Veluet paled,with horses trapped accordyngly which the king sent her, then folowed the seruyng men of her traine, all clothed in blacke and on great horses.

In this order they rode through the rankes, and so through the Parke, and at the late Friers wall all men alighted sauyng the king, the two Maysters of the horses and the Henremen which rode to the hall dore, and the Ladyes rode to the Court gate. And as they passed they beheld on the wharfe how the Citizens of London were rowyng vp and downe on the Thames euen before them,euery craft in his Barge garnished with Banners, Flagges, Stremers, Pencelles, and Targettes, some paynted and beaten wyth the kinges Armes,some with her Graces armes,and some with the Armes of their Craft or Mistery: Beside the Barges of euery Craft, there was a Barge made like a ship,called the Batchelers Barge,decked with clothe of Golde,penons, pencelles,and Targets, in great number, on whom wayted a Foyst that shot great peeces of Artillary. And in euery Barge was dyuers sortes of Instrumentes, and children and men singyng,which sang and played altogether,as the king & the Lady passed on the Wharfe,which sight and noyse they much praysed and alowed.

When the king and she were within the vtter Court,they alighted from their horses,and the king louingly embraced her,and kissed her, biddyng her welcome to her awne, and led her by her left arme through the hall which was furnished beneath the harth with the kings Garde, and aboue the harth with the fiftie Pencioners with their Battelaxes, and so brought her vp to her priue Chamber,where he left her for that tyme.

And assone as the king and she was entered the Court, was shot out of the Tower of Grenewich and thereabout,a great peale of Gunnes.

When the kinges company and hers was entered the Parke, as you haue heard, then all the horsemen on Blackheth brake their array, and had licence to depart to London, or to their lodging. To see howe long it was or the horsemen could passe, and howe late it was in the night ere the footemen could get ouer London Bridge, I assure you it was wonderous to beholde, the number was so great.

Thus this noble Ladie remayned vnmaried vntill the Tewesday folowyng beyng the daye of the Epiphanie: On which day about. viij. of the clocke in the mornyng, his Grace beyng appareled in a Gowne of clothe of golde, rayled with great flowers of siluer, furred with blacke Jennets, hys coate Crimosin Sattyn, all to cut and enbrodered, and tyed with great Diamondes, and a rich Coller about his necke, came solempnly with his nobilitie into the Gallary next the Closets, and there pansed.

Then the Lordes went to fetch the Ladie Anne, which was appareled in a Gowne of riche clothe of golde, set full of large flowers of great and orient pearle, made after the Dutch fashion round, her heare hangyng downe, which was fayre, yelow, and long: On her head a Coronall of golde replenished with great stone, & set about full of braunches of Rosemary. And about her necke and middle, Jewels of great value and estimation: In this apparell she goyng betwene the Erle of Ouersteyn, and the Graunde Mayster Hostoden, which had the conduite and order of the perfourmaunce of her mariage, with most demure countenaunce and sad behauiour, passed through the kings Chamber, all the Lordes goyng before her, till they came to the Gallary where the king was, to whom she made three low obeysances and curteses. Then the Archbishop of Cauntorbury receyued them, and maryed them together, and the Erle of Ouersteyn did geue her: and about her mariyng Ring was written: GOD SEND ME VVEL TO KEPE.

When the mariage was celebrate, they went hande in hande into the kinges Closet, and there heard Masse, and offered their Tapers, and after Masse had wine and spices, and that done the king departed to his Chamber, and all the Ladies wayted on her to her Chamber, the Duke of Norfolke goyng on the right hande, and the Duke of Suffolke on the left hande of her grace.

After. ix. of the clocke, the king with a gowne of riche Tissue lyned with Crimosyn Ueluet enbrodered, came to his Closet, and she in her heare in the same apparell that she was maryed in, came to her Closet with her Sergeaunt of Armes, and all her Officers, like a Queene, before her. And so the king and she went openly on Procession, and offered and dyned together. And after dinner she chaunged into a Gowne lyke a mannes Gowne, of Tissue with long sleeues gyrt to her, furred with rich Sables, her narrow sleeues were very costly, but on her head she had a Cap as she ware on the Saterday before with a Coronet of Laune, which Cap was so riche of Perle and stone, that it was iudged to be of great value. And after her fashion, her ladies and gentlewomen were appareled very rich and costly with Chaines of diuers fashions, and in this apparell she went that night to Euensong, and after supped with the king: and after supper were Bankettes, Maskes, and diuers disportes, till the tyme came that it pleased the king and her to take their rest.

The Sunday after were kept solempne Justes, which much pleased the the straungers. On which day she was appareled after the English fashion, with a French Whoode, which so set foorth her beautie and good vilage, that euery creature reioyced to behold her.

When the Erle of Querstein, and other Lordes and Ladyes which had geuen their attendaunce on her grace all that iournay, and had beene highly feasted of the king and other Nobles verye sumptuously, they tooke their leaue and had great giftes geuen to them, both in money and plate, and so returned toward their countrey, leauyng behind them the Erle of Waldock, and diuers other gentlemen and Damosels, which were retayned with her grace, till she were better acquainted in the realme.

The fourth day of Februarye next ensuyng, the king and she came to Westminster by water, accompanied with many Nobles and Prelates in Barges on whom the Maior and his brethren in scarlet, and. xij. of the chiefe companies of the Citie, all in Barges garnished with Banners, Pennons, & Targets, richly couered and replenished with musitians, gaue their attendance, and by the way all the shippes shot their ordinaunce, and out of the Tower was shot a great peale of Gunnes, in goodly order.

The. xviij. day of Februarye, were foure readers sent for to the Starre Chamber, of euery house of the foure principall Innes of Court one, where sate the Lord Chauncelor, the Lorde Priuie seale, and. xiiij. of the chiefe of the kinges Counsaile, and there the Lord Chauncelor declared, howe Sir John Shelton knight, had by the aduise of sir Humfrey Browne knight the kinges Serieaunt, sir Nicholas Hare knight, the kinges Counsaylor, and Speaker of the Parliament, and William Coigneslye Esquier, attournay of the Duchie of Lancaster, all beyng his seruauntes and of his fee, declared a fraudulent will of his landes, contrary to the statute made, Anno. xxviij. to the great hinderaunce of the kinges prerogatiue, and the true meanyng of the sayd statute, and also to the euill example of all other, that should defraude their Lords of their seigniories. Wherefore the sayd sir Humfray Browne, and sir Nicholas Hare, were that day by the whole Counsaile of the king dismissed of their Offices and seruice to the king, and sent to the Tower: and within three dayes after was William Coigneslye sent thether, where they remayned ten dayes, and after were deliuered: but they three lost all their Offices, that they had of the king.

Sir John Shelton, Sir Hūfrey Browne, Sir Nicholas Hare.

The. xij. day of Aprill began a Parliament, and sir Nicholas Hare was restored to the office of Speaker, in the which was freely graunted without contradictions, foure fiftenes and a subsidie, of two shillinges of landes, and xij. pence of goodes, toward the great charges of Bulwarkes.

The. xviij. day of April, at Westminster was Thomas Lord Cromwel created Erle of Esser, and made great Chamberlein of England, which euer the Erles of Orenford had, which promotions he enioyed short tyme, as in the next yere may appere.

Thomas Lord Cromwell created Erle of Esser.

In this Parliament also the religion of saint Johns in England, which of most men was named the knightes of the Rhodes, was dissolued, whereof beeryng sir William Weston knight, Prior of saint Johns, for thought dyed on the Astention day, beyng the fift day of May.

sons, which denied the kings supremacie: and for the same offence was one Richard Farmer Grocer of London, a riche and welthy man, and of good estimation in the Citie, committed to the Marshall See, and after in Westminster hall was arraigned and attaynted in the Premunire, and loste all hys goodes.

Thomas lorde Cromwell committed to the Tower.

The ninth day of July, Thomas Lorde Cromwell, late made Erle of Esser, as before you haue heard, beyng in the counsayle chamber, was so sodainely apprehended and committed to the Tower of London, the which many lamented, but mo reioyced, and specially such, as eyther had beene religious men, or fauoured religious persons, for they banqueted, and trumpyed together that night, many wyshing that that day, had bene seuen yere before, and some fearing least he should escape, although he were imprisoned, could not be merie. Other who knew nothing but truth by hym, both lamented him, and hartely prayed for him: But this is true, that of certayne of the Clergie, he was detestably hated, and specially suche as had borne swynge, and by hys meanes was put from it, for in deede he was a man, that in all his doings seemed not to fauor any kinde of Popery, nor coulde not abide the snuffing pride of some prelates, which vndoubtedly whatsoeuer else was the cause of his death, did shorten his life, and procured the ende that he was brought vnto: which was that the .xix. day of the sayde Month, he was attaynted by Parliament, and neuer came to his answere, which lawe many reported, he was causer of the makyng thereof, but that is false and vntrue: The articles for the which he dyed, appereth in the Record, where his attaynder is written, which are to long to be here rehersed, but to conclude he was there attaynted of heresie, and highe treason. And the xxviij. day of July was brought to the Scaffolde on the Tower hill, where he sayde these wordes folowyng.

The wordes of the Lorde Cromwell spoken at his death.

I am come hether to die, and not to purge my selfe, as maye happen, some thinke that I will, for if I should so doe, I were a verie wretche and miser: I am by the lawe condempned to die, and I thanke my Lorde God that hath appointed me this death, for mine offence: For sithence the time that I haue had yeres of discretion, I haue lyued a synner, and offended my Lorde God, for the which I aske him hartily forgeuenesse. And it is not vnknowne to many of you, that I haue bene a great trauayler in this worlde, and beyng but of a base degree, was called to highe estate, and sithence the time I came thereunto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartily forgeuenesse, and beseech you all to pray to God with mee, that he wyll forgeue me. O father forgeue mee, O sonne forgeue mee, O holy ghost forgeue me: O thre persons in one God forgeue me. And now I pray you that be here, to beare mee recorde, I die in the Catholike fayth, not doubting in any article of my faith, no nor doubting in any Sacrament of the Church. Many haue slaundered me, and reported that I haue beene a bearer of such as hath maintayned euil opinions, which is vntrue, but I confesse that lyke as God by his holy spirite, doth instruct vs in the truth, so the Deuill is readie to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witnesse that I die in the catholike faith of the holy Church. And I hartily desire you to pray for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you, in helth and prosperitie. And after him that his sonne prince Edwarde that goodly ympe,

ympe, may long raigne ouer you. And once agayne I desire you to pray for mee, that so long as lyfe remayneth in this flesshe, I wauer nothing in my faith. And then made he his prayer, which was long, but not so long, as both Godly and learned, and after committed his soule into the handes of God, and so pacyently suffered the stroke of the Axe, by a ragged and boocherly miser, which very vngoodly performed the office.

Sergeaunts Feaste.

On saint Peters euen, was kept the Serieants feast at saint Jhones with all plentie of wittayle. At which feast were made ten Serieauntes, three out of Greyes Inne, and three out of Lyncolnes Inne, and of euery of the Temples two. At which feast were present, all the Lordes and commons of the parliament, beside the Maior and the Aldermen, and a great number of the commons of the Citie of London.

The Lordes & Commons of the parliament bidden to the Sergeauntes feast.

The morrowe after Midsommer daye, the king caused the Queene to remoue to Richemond, purposing it to be more for her helth, open ayre and pleasure: but the sixt daye of July, certaine Lordes came downe into the nether house, which expressely declared causes, that the mariage betweene the king and her was not lawfull, and in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clerely determined, that the king might lawfully marry where he would, and so might she: and so were they cleerely deuorced and seperated, and by the parliament enacted and concluded, that shee should be taken no more as Queene, but called the Lady Anne of Cleue.

Quene Anne deuorced, and called Ladye Anne of Cleue.

In this yere the Lord Leonard Grey, brother to Thomas Lord Marques Dorset, beyng the kings Lieutenaunt in Irelande, practised sundrie feates for his profite, as in delyuering Traitors beyng hostages, and especially his Nephew Fitzgarard, brother to Thomas Fitzgarard before executed, and also caused such of the Irishe men, as he had intelligence with all, to inuade suche of the kings friendes, as he fauored not: wherefore the king sent for him, and he mistrusting and seing no refuge, wrote to the kings enemies to inuade the English pale after his departure. And also he kept the kings treasure to his awne vse, without retaining souldiors according to his commission, wherpon when he came to London, he was sent to the Tower.

Lorde Leonard Graye.

In Julye the Prince of Salerne, in the realme of Naples, and the Lorde Lois Deuola, came into Englande to see the king, which had highe chere and great rewards, and so departed. And after them came Done Frederick Marques of Padulla, brother to the Duke of Farrare, and the Prince of Macedonia, and the Marques of Terra Noua, and Mounsire de Flagy, and sirtene other Gentlemen, from the Emperors Court into England to see the king, which on the day of Mary Magdalene came to the Court to Westminster, and were highly feasted and well enterteyned, and with great rewardes departed.

The twentie and eight day of July as you haue heard before in this yeare, was the Lorde Cromwell behedded, and with him likewise was behedded the Lorde Hungerford of Heytesburie, which Lorde Hungerford at the time of his death, seemed to be verie vnquyet in his minde, and rather in a frensie then otherwise.

Lorde Hungerford behedded.

The thirtie daye of July, were drawne on herdels out of the Tower to Smithfielde, Robert Barnes Doctor in diuinitie, Thomas Garet and Wylliam Jherome Bachelers in Diuinitie: Powell, Fetherston, and Barnes, Garard and Jerom.

Powell. The first three were drawne to the stake, there before set vp, and were burned: and the latter three drawne to the Galowes, likewise there set vp, and were hanged, hedded, and quartered.

Powell, Fetherston, and Abell.

The last three which were Powell, Fetherston, and Abell, were put to death for treason, and in their attaindor, is speciall mention made of their offences, which was for the denying of the kings supremacie, and affirming that his mariage with the Ladie Katheryn was good: These with other were the treasons, that they were attainted of, and suffered death for.

Thomas Eplam an obstinate Monke.

The fourth daye of August Thomas Epsam, sometime Monke of Westminster, which had bene prisoner for treason, three yeres and more in Newgate, came before the Justices of Gaole deliuery at Newgate, & would not aske the kinges pardon, nor be sworne to be true to him, wherefore his Monkes garment was plucked from his back, and he reprid till the king knewe hys malicious obstinacie: and this was the laste Monke that was sene in his clothing in Englande.

In this Moneth were certayne Commissioners sent by the king into Irelande, to enquire of the Lorde Leonard Gray, which certified diuers articles agaynst him, as ye shall heare in the next yere following.

Katherine Haward shewed as Queene

The eyght day of August, was the Lady Katheryn Haward, Neece to the Duke of Norffolke, and daughter to the Lorde Edmond Haward, shewed openly as Queene at Hampton Court, which dignitie she enioyed not long, as after ye shall heare.

A great death and strange sickenesse.

In the latter ende of this month was vniuersally through the realme great death, by reason of newe hote Agues and Fluxes, and some pestilence, in which season was such a drought, that Welles & small riuers were cleane dryed, so that much Cattle dyed for lack of water: and the Thames was so shalowe, and the freshe water of so small strength, that the salt water flowed aboue London bridge, till the rayne had increased the freshe waters.

Raufe Egerton hanged

Thomas Harman.

On the. xvij. daye of December, was Raufe Egerton seruaunt to the Lorde Audeley Chauncelour, hanged, drawen, and quartered, for counterfeityng of the kinges great seale, & had sealed a great number of licenses for Denizens, & one Thomas Harman that wrote them, was also executed: for the statute made the last parliament was very extreme against straungers, and namely against those which were not Denizens, which caused them to offer to Egerton great sommes of money to helpe them to be Denyzens, the desire whereof caused hym to practise, that which brought him to the ende, that before is declared.

The building of the Castell of Arde.

In the end of this yere the French king made a strong Castel at Arde, and also a bridge ouer into the Englishe pale, which bridge the Crewe of Calice did beat downe, and the French men reedified the same, and the Englishe men bet it downe agayne. And after the king of Englande sent fiftene hundred workemen, to wall and fortefie Guysnes, and sent with them fiue hundred men of warre, with Capitaynes to defend them. The noyes ranne in Fraunce, that there were fiftie thousand Englishe men landed at Calice with great ordinaunce: wherefore the Frenche king sent in all haste, the Duke of Uandosme, and diuers other Capitaynes, to the Frontiers of Picardy to defend the same. The king of Englande hearing thereof, sent the Erles of Surrey and Southampton and the Lorde Russell, his great Admirall mirall into the marches of Calice, to set an order there: and after them sent two .C. light horsemen of the borderers of Scotlande: whome the frenche men called stradiates, which Lordes when they had set all things in a good order shortly returned.

In the beginning of this yere, fiue Priestes in Yorkeshyre began a new rebellion, with the assent of one Leigh a Gentleman, and nine Temporall men, which were apprehended, and shortly after in diuerse places put in execution, insomuch that on the .xvij. day of Maye, the sayde Leigh and one Tatersall, and Thornton, were drawne through London to Tiborne, and there were executed. And syr John Neuell knight, was executed for the same at Yorke.

On the same day was Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, which had beene long prisoner in the Tower, beheaded in the Tower, and shee was the last of the right line and name of Plantagenet.

Margaret Countesse of Salisbury beheaded.

The ninth day of June, were Damport and Chapman, two of the kings Gard, hanged at Greenewithe by the Friers Wall, for robberies in example of all other.

Damport, Chapman.

During this season, the commissioners that before were sent into Irelande, to inquire of the Lord Gray, certified twentie articles of high treason against him, wherevpon he was arreigned and tryed by knyghtes, because he was a Lorde of name, but no Lorde of the parliament: howbeit he discharged the Jury, and confessed the inditement, and therevpon was iudged, and after beheaded at the Tower hill, where he ended his life very quietlye and godly.

The Lorde Leonard Gray condempned.

In this season was arreigned and condempned three Gentlemen, called Mantell, Roydon, and Frowdes, and were hanged at Saint Thomas of Wateringes. Likewise was Thomas Fines Lorde Dacres of the South arreigned before the Lorde Audeley of Walden, then Chauncellor of England, and that day Stuard of the same at Westminster, and there before the sayd Lorde Chauncellor and his Peres, he confessed the Indytement, and so had iudgement to be hanged. And the twentie and nine daye of June, being Saint Peters day at after noone, he was led on foote, betwene the two Shrifes of London, from the Tower through the Citie to Tiborne, where he was strangled, as common murderers are, and his bodye buried in the Church of Saint Sepulchers. The cause of the death of this noble man, and the other Gentlimen, was a murder of a simple man, and an vnlawfull assemblie made in Sussex. Great moane was made for them all, but most speciall for Mantell, who was as wittie, and as toward a Gentleman, as any was in the realme, and a man hable to haue done good seruice.

Mantell, Roydon, Frowdes,

The Lorde Dacres of the South hanged

This Sommer the king kept his progresse to Yorke and passed through Lincolneshire, where was made to him an humble submission by the Temporaltie, confessing their offence, and thanking the king for his pardon: and the towne of Staunforde gaue the king twentie pounde, and Lyncolne presented fortie pounde, and Boston fiftie pounde that part which is called Lindsey gaue three hundred pounde, and Kestren and the Church of Lincolne gaue fiftie pounde. And when he entred into Yorkeshire, he was met with two hundred Gentlemen of the same Shire, in coates of Ueluet, and foure thousand tall yemen, and Seruing men, well horsed: which on their knees made made a ſubmiſſion, by the mouth of ſir Robert Bowes, and gaue to the king nine hundred pound. And on Barneſdale met the king, the Archebi ſhoppe of Yorke, with three hundred Prieſtes and more, and made a like ſubmiſſion, and gaue the king ſix hundred pounde. Like ſubmiſſion was made by the Maior of Yorke, New Caſtell, and Hull, and eche of them gaue to the king an hundred pound. When the king had beene at Yorke twelue dayes, he came to Hull, and deuiſed there certaine fortifications, and paſſed ouer the water of Humber, and ſo through Lincolne Shyre, and at Alhalontide came to Hampton Court.

Queene Katherin beheaded.

At this time the Queene late before maried to the king called Queene Katheryn Hawarde was accuſed to the king of diſſolute liuing before her maryage, with Frauncis Diram, and that was not ſecretely, but many knew of it. And ſith her mariage ſhee was vehemently ſuſpected with Thomas Culpeper, which was brought to her chamber at Lincolne in Auguſt laſt in the progreſſe time, by the Lady Rocheford, and were together alone, from a xj. of the clocke at night, till foure of the clocke in the morning, and to him ſhee gaue a Chayne, and a rich Cap. Vppon this the king remoued to London, & ſhe was ſent to Sion, and there kept cloſe, but yet ſerued as Queene. And for the offence confeſſed by Culpeper and Diram, they were put to deth at Tiborne, the tenth day of December. And the two and twentie day of the ſame moneth, were arreigned at Weſtminſter, the Lorde William Hawarde and his wife, which Lorde William was Uncle to the Queene, Katheryne Tilney which was of counſayle of her hauing to do with Diram, Elizabeth Tilney, Boulmer, Reſtwoulde, the Queenes women, and Walgraue and William Aſby, and Damport Gentlemen, and ſeruaunts to the olde Duches of Norffolke, and Margaret Benet a Butter wife, all indited of miſpriſion, for concealing the euill demeanor of the Queene, to the ſlaunder of the king, and his ſucceſſion: all they confeſſed it, and had iudgement to perpetuall priſon, and to loſe their goodes and the profite of their landes, during their liues: howbeyt ſhortely after, diuerſe of them were deliuered by the kinges pardon.

Culpeper, Diram, Lorde William Haward Katherin Tilney, Elizabeth Tilney, Boulmer, Reſtwoode, Walgraue, William Aſby Damport, Margaret Benet, Petitions made to the king by the parliament houſe.

The. xvj. day of January the Parliament begamne, in the which the Lordes and Commons aſſented, to deſire of the king certaine petitions.

1 Firſt that he would not bere himſelf with the Queenes offence, and that ſhe and the Ladie Rocheford, might be attainted by parliament.

2 Alſo becauſe protractyng of tyme, which the more ſhould be to his vnquietneſſe, that he would vnder his great ſeale, geue hys royall aſſent, without tarying the ende of the parliament.

Agnes Duchelle of Norffolk, Katheryn Countelle of Brigwater.

3 Alſo, that Diram and Culpepper, before attaynted by the common law, might alſo be attainted by parliament.

4 Alſo, that Agnes Duchelle of Norffolke, and Katheryn Countelle of Bridgewater her daughter, which were for concealyng the ſaid offence committed to the Tower, Indited of miſpriſion, and the Lorde William and other, arreigned of the ſame, might be likewyſe attainted.

5 Alſo, that whoſoeuer had ſpoken or done any act, in the deteſtation of her abhominable liuyng, ſhould be pardoned.

To the which petitions the king graunted, ſaiyng that he thanked the Commons, that they tooke his ſorow to be theirs. Whereupon the Queene and the Ladie Rochefoꝛd were attainted by both the houſes. And on Saterday beyng the .xj. day of Febꝛuary, the king ſent his roial aſſent, by his great Seale: and then all the Loꝛdes were in their Robes, and the common houſe called vp, and there the acte read, and his aſſent declared. And ſo on the thirtene daye, theſe two Ladies were beheadded on the greene, within the Tower with an axe, and confeſſed their offences, and died repentaunt. And ſhoꝛtly after the king maryed the Lady Katheryn Parre that had bene wife to the Loꝛde Latimer, and ſhe was ſiſter to the Marques of Noꝛthampton.

and

In the beginnyng of Marche died ſir Arthur Plantagenet Viſcount Liſle baſtard to king Edward the fourth, in the Tower of London vnattainted, when he ſhould haue bene deliuered, and put at his libertie. And the .xij. day of the ſayd moneth, ſir John Awdeley ſonne and heyꝛe to the ſayd Loꝛde Liſles wyfe, was at Weſtminſter created Viſcount Liſle.

The Parliament ſittyng, in Lent one Geoꝛge Ferrers Bourgeoys foꝛ the towne of Plimmouth, was areſted in London vpon a condemnation, at the ſuyte of one Whyte, Wherevpon the Seriеaunt at Armes of the common houſe, was ſent to the Counter in Bredſtreete to fetch him: but the Clerkes would not deliuer him, wherefoꝛe the Seriеaunt and his man, would haue bꝛought him away perfoꝛce. Diuers of the Shiriffes officers there pꝛeſent, withſtood the Seriеaunt, ſo that they fell to quarrelling: and the Seriеants man was ſoꝛe hurt. After the fray ended, the Shiriffes of London, whoſe names were Rowland Hill, and Henry Suckly came to the counter, and firſt denyed the deliuery of the pꝛiſoner, howbeit afterward they deliuered him. But this matter was ſo taken in the common houſe, that the Shiriffes and the Clerke, and fiue officers, and the partie plaintife, were ſent to the Tower, and there lay two dayes, and were deliuered againe by the Speaker and common houſe.

In this yere James Erle of Deſmond came to the king, and was honourably entertеyned and well rewarded. And in September the great Onele came to Grenewich, where he and a Capitaine of the Noꝛth parts of Ireland called Magannylle, and the Biſhop of Cloar, made their ſubmiſſion in wꝛityng, confeſſyng their offences, and pꝛomiſyng to ſeꝛue the king and his heyꝛes truely: which ſubmiſſion by the king conſidered, he vpon the firſt day of October created at Grenewich the ſaid ſir Euſtace Onele called great Onele (becauſe he was the chiefe of his linage called Onele) Erle of Tereowen, commonly called Tyꝛon, and gaue hym a great Chayne, and made Magannylle and his Coſyn knightes, and gaue them both Chaynes, and he gaue to the Loꝛd Mathias, ſonne to the Erle, the Baronny of Duncan.

At this ſeaſon the kinges Maieſtie pꝛepared foꝛ warre into Scotland, the cauſe why this war was made is moſt manifeſtly declared by that which foloweth, which the kinges Maieſtie publiſhed by this title. A declaration contеynyng the iuſt cauſes and conſiderations of this preſent vvarre with the Scottes, vvherein alſo appeareth the true and right tytle that the kinges moſt royall Maieſtie hath to his ſouereignitie of Scotland. And it beginneth thus.

¶ Being now enfoꝛced to the warre, which we haue alwayes hetherto ſo much

muth abhorred and fled, by our neighbor and nephew to the king of Scots, one who aboue all other, for our manifolde benefites towardes him, hath moste iust cause to loue vs, to honour vs, and to reioyce in our quietnesse: We haue thought good to notifie vnto the worlde his doynges and behauiour in the prouocation of this warre, and likewyse the meanes and wayes by vs to exchue and auoyde it, and the iust and true occasions, whereby we be nowe prouoked to prosecute the same, and by vtteraunce and diuulgyng of that matter, to disburden some part of our inward displeasure and griefe, and the circumstaunces knowen, to lament openly with the worlde, the infidelity of this tyme, in which thinges of such enormitie do brest out and appere.

The king of Scottes our nephew and neighbor, whom we in his youth and tender age preserued and maintayned from the great daunger of other, and by our authoritie and power conducted him safely to the reall possession of his estate, he now cōpelleth and forceth vs for preseruation of our honor and right, to vse our puyssaunce and power agaynst him. The lyke vnkindenesse hath beene heretofore shewed by other insemblable cases agaynst Gods lawe, mans law, and all humanitie: but the oftner it chaunceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the persons of Princes for the raritie of them can so happen but seldome, as it hath now come to passe.

It hath beene verye rarely and seldome seene before, that a king of Scottes hath had in mariage a daughter of England: We can not, ne will not reprehend the king our fathers act therein, but lament and be sory it toke no better effect. The king our father in that matter mynded loue, amitie, and perpetuall friendship betweene the posteritie of both, which how soone it fayled, the death of the king of Scottes, as a due punishment of God for his vniust inuasion into this our realme, is and shall be a perpetuall testimonie to their reproche for euer, and yet in that present tyme could not the vnkindnesse of the father extinguische in vs the naturall loue of our nephewe his sonne, beyng then in the miserable age of tender youth: but we then forgettyng the displeasure that shoulde haue worthily prouoked vs to inuade that realme, nourished & brought vp our nephewe to atchieue his fathers possession and gouernemēt, wherin he now so vnkindly vseth & behaueth him towardes vs; as he compelleth vs to take armour and warre agaynst him.

It is specially to be noted, vpon what groundes, and by what meanes we be compelled to this warre, wherin among other is our chiefe griefe and displeasure, that vnder a colour of fayre speche and flatteryng wordes, we be in deedes so iniured, contemned and dispysed, as we ought not with sufferaunce to pretermit and passe ouer. Wordes, writynges, letters, messages, ambassades, excuses, allegations, could not more pleasauntly, more gently, ne more reuerently be deuised and sent, then hath beene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs, and euer we trusted the tree would bring forth good fruite, that was of the one part of so good a stocke, and continually in apparaunce put foorth so fayre buddes: and therefore would hardly beleue or geue eare to other, that euer alleged the dedes of the contrary, beyng neuertheles the same dedes so manifest, as we must nedes haue regarded them, had we not bene so lothe to thinke euill of our nephewe, whom we had so many wayes bound to be of the best sort toward vs. And therefore hauyng a message sent vnto vs the yere past from our sayd nephewe, and a promise made for the repayring of the sayd king of Scottes vnto vs to Yorke, and after great preparation on our part made therfore, the same meetyng was not onely disappoynted, but also at our beyng at Yorke, in the lieu thereof, an inuasion made by our sayde Nephew his subiectes into our realme, declaryng an euident contempt and dispyte of vs: We were yet glad to impute the default of the meetyng to the aduise of his Counsaile, and the inuasion of the lewdnesse of his subiectes: and accordyng therevnto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to such Ambassadors, as repayred hither at Christmasse afterwarde, as if no such causes of displeasure had occurred, specially conside-ryng the good wordes, sweete wordes, pleasaunt woordes, effsoones propo-ned by the sayde Ambassadors, not onely to excuse that was past, but also to perswade kindnesse and perfite amitie to ensue. And albeit the king of Scots hauyng contrary to the article of the league of amitie, receyued and entertey-ned such rebels, as were of the chiefe and principle, in stirryng the insurrec-tion in the North agaynst vs with refusall before tyme, vpon request made to restore the same: yet neuertheless vpon offer made, the sayde Ambassa-dours, to sende commission to the Borderers, to determine the debates of the confines in the same, with so great a pretence of amitie, and so fayre wordes, as could be in speeche desired: we were content for the tyme to forbeare to presse them ouer extremely in the matter of rebelles. Albeit we neuer remitted the same, but desyrous to make tryall of our sayd Nephew in some correspondence of deedes, condiscended to the sendyng of Commissio-ners to the Borders, which to our great charge we did, & the king of Scots our sayd Nephew the semblеable. Where after great trauaile made by our Commissioners, this fruite ensued, that beyng for our part chalenged a piece of our ground, plainely vsurped by the Scottes, and of no great value, being also for the same shewed such euidence, as more substãciall, more autentique, more plain and euident cannot be brought forth for any part of ground with-in our realme. The same was neuertheless by them denyed, refused, and the euidence onely for this cause reiected, that it was made (as they alleged) by Englishmen. And yet it was so auncient, as it could not be counterfeyt now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so smal waight, as no man would haue attempted to falsifie for such a matter. And yet this denyall beyng in this wyse made vnto our Commissioners, they neuertheless by our com-maundement departed as friendes fro the Commissioners of Scotland, takyng order as hath beene accustomed for good rule vpon the Borders in the meane tyme.

After which their recesse, the Lord Maxwel, Warden of the West Mar-ches of Scotland, made proclamation for good rule, but yet added therewith that the Borderers of Scotlande shoulde withdraw their goodes from the Borderers of England: And incõtinent after the Scottish men Borderers, the fourth of July, entered into our realme sodainely, and spoyled our sub-iectes, contrary to our leagues, euen after such extremitie, as it had bene in tyme of open warre. Whereat we much maruayled, and were cõpelled ther-fore to furnishe our Border with a garrison for defence of the same. Where-vpon the king of Scottes sent vnto vs James Leyzmouth, Maister of hys householde, with letters deuised in the most pleasaunt maner, offeryng re-dresse and reformation of all attemptates. And yet neuertheless at the entry of the sayd Leyzmouth into England, a great number of the Scottes, then not looked for, made a forrey into our Borders, to the great annoyaunce of our subiects, and to their extreeme detriment, wherewith, and with that vnsemely dissimulation, we were not a little moued, as reason would we should And yet did we not finally so extremely persecute and continue our sayd displeasure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the sayd Leyzmouth, and suffered oure selfe to be somewhat altered by his wordes and fayre promises, tending to the perswasion that we euer desired to find the king of Scots such a nephew vnto vs, as our proximitie of bloud with our gratuitie vnto hym did require. In the meane tyme of these fayre wordes, the deedes of the Borderers were as extreme as might be, and our Subiectes spoyled: and in a roade made by syr Robert Bowes for a reuenge thereof, the same syr Robert Bowes with many other taken prisoners, and yet detayned in Scotland, without putting them to fine and raunsome, as hath beene euer accustomed. And beyng at the same time a surseasaunce made on both sides, at the suite of the sayde Leyzmouth for a season: the Scottes ceased not to make sundry inuasions into our realme in such wise, as we were compelled to forget fayre wordes, and onely to consider the king of Scots deedes which appered vnto vs of that sorte, as they ought not for our dutie in defence of our subiectes, ne could not in respect of our honor, be passed ouer vnreformed: and therfore put in a redinesse our armye, as a due meane whereby we might attaine such a peace, as for the safegarde of our Subiectes we be bounde to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowlege had thereof, the king of Scottes ceased not to vse his accustomed meane of fayre wordes, which in our naturall inclynation wrought ettsones their accustomed effect, euermore desirous to finde in the king of Scottes such regarde and respect to be declared in dedes as the correspondence of naturall loue in the nephew to such an Uncle, as we haue shewed our selfe towardes him, doth require. Wherefore vpon new request and suite made vnto vs, we determined to stay our army at Yorke, appoynting the Duke of Norffolke our Lieutenaunt, the Lorde Pryuieseale, the Bishop of Durham, and the Maister of our horses, there to common, treat, and conclude with the Ambassadors of Scotlande. for an amytie and peace vpon such condition, as by reason and equytie were indifferent, whereby the warre might be eschued, beyng by sundry inuasion of the Scottes than opened and manifest.

In this communication betweene our and their Commissioners, after diuers degrees of commission, shewed by the Scottes, and finally one that was by our commissioners allowed, matters were proponed for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficile or hard of our part, but so agreeable to reason, as the Commissioners of Scotlande sayde, they doubted not, but if it might be brought to passe, that the king of Scottes our Nephieu, might haue a meeting with vs, all matters should easely be componed and determined. Wherupon they left speaking of anye articles of amitie, and the Ambassadours of Scotlande made much outward ioy in communication of meeting, they shewed themselfe in wordes, fashion and behauor much to delight in it, to reioice in it, & therewith thought it easie and facile to be concluded and accomplished and for their part they tooke it then for a thing passed, a thing concluded, and moſt certayne to take effect, and onely deſyred ſyx daies to obtaine aunſwere from their Maiſter, and our army from that time to ſtay and go no further: Wherevnto our Commiſſioners then agreed.

After theſe ſix dayes was ſent a Commiſſion out of Scotlande, with power to conclude a meting preciſely at ſuch a place, as they knew well we would not, ne could not in Winter obſerue and kepe, wherewith when our Commiſſioners were miſcontent, the Ambaſſadors of Scotlande to releue that diſpleaſure, and to temper the matter, whereby to win more time, ſhewed forth their inſtructions, wherein libertie was geuen to the Ambaſſadors to exceede their commiſſion in the apoyntment of the place, and to conſent to any other that by our Commiſſioners ſhould be thought conuenient, which maner of proceeding, when our Commiſſioners refuſed, alleging that they would not conclude a meeting with men, hauing no commiſſion thervnto. The Ambaſſadors of Scotland vpon pretence to ſend for a more ample and larger commiſſion agreeable to their inſtructions for appoyntement of the place, obteyned a delay of other ſyx dayes to ſend for the ſayde ample Commiſſion without reſtraynt of place. And after thoſe ſix dayes they brought forth a new commiſſion, made in a good forme, and without exception: But therewith they ſhewed alſo new inſtructions, conteyning ſuch a reſtraynt as the former commiſſion did conteyn, ſo as the liberty geuen to the Commiſſioners in the commiſſion was now at the laſt remoued and taken away by the inſtructions, with addition of a ſpeciall charge to the Ambaſſadors not to exceede the ſame. Hudels and craftie Scots

And this firſt the Ambaſſadors of Scotlande ſeemed to haue will and deſire to conclude a place ſemely and conuenient, which for want of commiſſion they might not do, and at the laſt might haue concluded a meting by vertue of their commiſſion, and then for feare of the commaundement in their ſecond inſtructions they durſt not. And ſo they ſhewed their firſt inſtructions partely to excuſe their king, who ſhould ſeme ſecretely to wyll more, then in the commiſſion he did openly profeſſe. And then with an ample commiſſion from the king, they ſhewed their ſecret inſtructiõs for defence of themſelues why they proceded not according to their commiſſion, not caring how much they charged therein their king, whoſe fault they diſcloſed to diſcharge themſelues, truſting that by benefite of the winter approching, and the time loſt in their communication their Maiſter ſhould be defended againſt our power for this yere, without doyng for their part that by honor, right, lawe, and leagues they be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our Subiectes beyng taken priſoners in Scotland could not be deliuered vpon any raunſome, contrary to all cuſtome and vſage of the borderers in the time of peace and warre, and in this meane time ſtayed a great part of our armye already preſted, and in our wages to go forward. In this time Ambaſſadors (as ye haue heard) aſſembled to talke of an amytie but concluded none. The treating of amytie was put ouer by communication of a meeting.

The communication of meeting was ſo handled by alteration of commiſſion and inſtructions on their behalfe, as it appereth a playne deuiſe onely inuented for a delay, which hath geuen vs light, wherevpon more certainly to iudge the king of Scottes inward affection towards vs, whoſe deedes and wordes well weyed and conſidered, doth vs playnely to vnderſtande, how he hath continually labored to abuse vs with swete and pleasaunt wordes and to satisfie the appetites of other at home and abroade with his vnkinde and displeasaunt deedes. In his wordes he professeth an indissoluble amitie, he allegeth kindred, he knowledgeth benefits, onely the fault is that he speaketh another language to all the worlde in deedes, and thereby so toucheth vs in honor and denegation of iustice, as we be inforced and compelled to vse the sworde, which God hath put in oure hande as an extreme remedie, whereby to obteyne both quyetnesse for our subiectes, and also that is due vnto vs by right, pactes and leagues.

We haue patiently suffered many delusions, and notably the last yere when we made preparation at Yorke for his repaire to vs: But should we suffer our people and subiectes to be so oft spoyled without remedie? This is done by the Scottes whatsoeuer their woordes be. Should we suffer our rebels to be detayned contrarie to the leagues without remedy? This is also done by them whatsoeuer their wordes be. Should we suffer our lande to be vsurped contrarie to our most playne euidence, onely vpon a will, pride, and arrogancie of the other partie? This is done by them whatsoeuer their wordes be. And all these be ouer presumptuously done agaynst vs, and geue suche signification of their arrogancie, as it is nessarie for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, least they should gather further courage to the greater displeasure of vs and our posteritie hereafter. And yet in the intreating of this matter, if we had not euidently perceyued the lack of such affection as proximitie of bloud should require, we would much rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximitie of bloud to our Nephew, than we did heretofore the inuasion of his father. But considering we be so surely assertayned of the lack thereof, and that our bloud is there frozne with the colde aire of Scotlande, there was neuer prince more violently compelled to warre then we be, by the vnkinde dealyng, vnnatural behauior, vnprincely demeanor of him that yet in nature is our Nephewe, and in his actes and deedes declareth himselfe not to be moued therewith, ne to haue suche earnest regard to the obseruation of his pactes and leagues, ne such respect to the intertainment of the administration of Justice, as naturall equitie byndeth, and conseruation of amity doth require: which we much lament and be sorye for, and vse nowe our force and puyssaunce agaynst him, not for reuengement of our priuate displeasure (beyng so often deluded as we haue beene) but for recouery of our right, the preseruation of our subiectes from iniuries, and the obseruation of such leagues as haue passed betweene vs, firmely trustyng, that almightie God vnder whom we reigne, will assist and ayde our iust proceedings herein to the furtherance and aduauncement of the right, which we doubt not shall euer preuayle agaynst wrong, falshoode, decept, and dissimulation.

Hetherto it appereth howe this present warre hath not proceeded of any demaūd of our right of superiority, which the kinges of Scots haue alwaies knowleged by homage and fealtie to our progenitors euen from the beginning: But this warre hath bene prouoked and occasioned vpon present matter of displeasure, present iniurie, present wrong ministred by the Nephew to the Uncle most vnnaturally, and supported contrary to the desertes of our benefites most vnkindly. If we had minded the possession of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to attaine the same, there was neuer king of thys realme had more opportunitie in the minoritie of our Nephewe. Ne in anye other realme a prince that hath more iust title, more euident title, more certaine title, to any realme that he can claime, then we haue to Scotland, not deuised by pretence of mariage, not imagined by couenaunt, nor contriued by inuention of argument, but lineally descended from the beginning of that estate established by our progenitors, and recognised successiuely of the kings of Scotlande by deedes, woordes, actes and wrytings contynually almost without interruption, or at the least intermission, till the reigne of our progenitor king Henry the first, in whose time the Scottes abused the ciuill warre of thys realme, to their licence and boldnesse, in omittyng of their duetie: which for the proximitie of blond betweene vs, we haue bene slacke to require of them, beyng also of our selfe inclined to peace, as we haue euer bene alwayes glad, rather without preiudice to omit to demaunde our right if it might conserue peace, then by demaunding thereof to be seene to moue warre, specially agaynst our neighbor, agaynst our Nephewe, against him whome we haue preserued from daunger, and in suche a time as it were expedient for all christendome to be vnite in peace, wherby to be the more able to resist the common enimie the Turke.

But for what considerations we haue omitted to speake hetherto of the matter, it is neuertheles true, that the kings of Scottes haue alwayes knowleged the kings of England superior Lordes of the realme of Scotlande, and haue done homage and fealtie for the same. The king of Scots haue alwayes acknowleged the kinges of England to be their Superior Lords

This appereth first by history, written by suche as for confirmation of the truth in memorie, haue truely noted and signified the same.

Secondly it appereth by instruments of homage made by the kinges of Scottes, and diuers notable personages of Scotlande, at diuers and sundrie times sealed with their Seales, and remayning in oure treasorie. Thirdly it appereth by Regesters & Records iudicially and autentiquely made, yet preserued for confirmation of the same. So as the matter of tytle beyng most playne, is furnished also with all maner of euidences for declaration thereof.

First as concerning histories, which be called wytnesses of times, the light of truth, and the life of memorie, and finally the conuenient waye and meane, whereby the things of antiquitie maye be brought to mens knowledge, they shew as playnely this matter as could be wyshed or required, with such a consent of wryters, as could not so agree vpon an vntruth, conteyning a declaratiõ of such matter as hath most euident probabilitie and apparaunce. For as it is probable and likely, that for the better administration of iustice amongst rude people, two or moe of one estate might be rulers in one Countrie vnite, as this Isle is: so is it probable & likely, that in the beginning it was so ordered for auoyding dissension, that there should be one superior in right, of whome the sayde estates should depende. According whereunto we read how Brute, of whome the realme then called Britayne tooke first that name (beyng before that time inhabited with Grauntes, people without order or ciuilitie) had three sonnes, Locrine, Albanact, and Camber, and determinyng to haue the whole Isle within the Ocean sea to be after gouerned by them three, appointed Albanact to rule that now is called Brute of whome this realme was first called Britaine.

Scotland, Camber the parties of Wales, and Locrine that nowe is called England: vnto whom as being the elder sone, the other two brethren should doe homage recognising and knowleging him as their superior. Now consider if Brutus conquered all this Iland, as the historie sayth he did, and then in his owne time made this order of superiority as afore: how can there be a title deuised of a more playne beginning, a more iust beginning, a more conuenient beginning for the order of this Iland, at that time specially when the people were rude, which cannot without continuall strife and bartaunce conteyne two or three rulers in all points equal without any maner of superiozitie, the inwarde conscience and remorse of which superiozitie should in some part dulle and diminish the peruerse courage of resistence and rebellio. The first diuision of this Ile we find it written after this sort without cause of suspicion why they should write amisse. And according herevnto we find also in histories set foorth by dyuers, howe for transgression agaynst thys superiozitie, our predecessors haue chastised the kings of Scottes, and some deposed, and put other in their places.

We will here omit to speake of the rudenesse of the antiquitie in particularitie, which they cared not distinctly to commit to writing, but some authors, as Anthonius Sabellicus amongst other diligently enserching, what he might truely write of al Europe, and the Ilandes adioyning, ouer and besides that which he writeth of the nature, maners, and conditions of the Scottes, which who so list to read, shall finde to haue bene the verie same in tunes past, that we finde them now at this present, he calleth Scotlande part of Englande, which is agreeable to the deuision aforesayde, beyng in deede as in the lande continuall without seperation of the sea, so also by homage and fealtie vnite vnto the same, as by particuler declarations shall most manifestly appere by the testimonie of suche as haue left writing for proofe and confirmation therof. In which matter passing ouer the death of king Humber, the actes of Dunwald king of this realme, the deuision of Belin and Brene, the victories of king Arthur, we shall beginne at the yere of our Lorde. 900. which is. 642. yeres past, a time of sufficient auncienty from which we shal make speciall declaration and euidence of the execution, of oure right and title of superiozitie, euermore continued and preserued hetherto.

The homages of the Scottes done to the kings of Englande from time to time.

Edwarde the first before the conquest, sonne to Alured kyng of Englande had vnder his dominion and obedience the king of Scots. And here is to be noted, that this matter was so notorious and manifest, as Maryan a Scot writing that storie in those dayes, graunteth, confesseth, and testifieth the same, & this dominion continued in that state. xviii. yere: At which tyme Athelstaine succeeded in the crowne of Englande, and hauing by battayle conquered Scotlande, he made one Constantine king of that partie, to rule and gouerne the Countrie of Scotland vnder him, addyng this princely worde, that it was more honor to him to make a king, then to be a king.

To make a king is more honorable then to be a king.

Twentie and foure yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lorde 947. Eldred king our progenitor, Athelstaines brother, tooke homage of Irise then king of Scottes.

Reynald king of Scottes.

Thirtie yeres after that, whych was in the yere of oure Lorde. 977. king Edgar our predecessor tooke homage of Kinald king of Scots. Here was was a little trouble in Englande by the death of Saint Edwarde king and martir, destroied by the deceit of his mother in law: but yet within memory.

Malcolme king of Scottes.

Foꝛty yeres after the homage done by Rynald to king Edgare, that is to saye, in the yere of oure Loꝛde. 1017. Malcolme king of Scottes did homage to Knute our predecessoꝛ. After this homage done the Scottes vttered some piece of their naturall disposition, wherevpon by warre made by our pꝛogenitoꝛ saint Edward the Confessoꝛ. xxxix. yere after that homage done, that is to saye, the yere of our Loꝛd. 1056. Malcolme king of Scottes was vanquished, and the realme of Scotland geuen to Malcolme his sonne by our sayde pꝛogenitoꝛ saint Edward: vnto whome the sayd Malcolme made homage and fealtie.

William the Conqueroꝛ.

Within .xj. yeres after that William Conquerour entered this realme, whereof he accoumpted no perfect conquest, vntill he had likewise subdued the Scottes, and therefoꝛe in the sayde yere, which was in the yere of our Loꝛde a thousand. lxviij. the sayd Malcolme king of Scottes did homage to the sayde William Conquerour, as his superiour by conquest kyng of Englande.

Xxv. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Loꝛde. M. xciij. the sayde Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, sonne to the said William Conqueroꝛ: and yet after that was foꝛ his offences and demerites deposed, and his sonne substitute in his place, who likewyse fayled of his dutie, and therefoꝛe was oꝛdeyned in that estate by the sayde William Rufus, Edgar bꝛother to the last Malcolme, and sonne to the first, who did his homage and fealtie accoꝛdingly.

Edgar king of Scottes.

Seuen yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Loꝛde. M. C. the sayde Edgar king of Scottes, did homage to Henrye the first, our pꝛogenitour.

Dauid king of Scottes.

Xxviij. yere after that Dauid king of Scottes did homage to Matilde the Emperatrice, as daughter and heyꝛe to Henry the first. Wherefoꝛe being after required by Stephen, then obteynyng possession of the realme, to make his homage, he refused so to do, because he had befoꝛe made it to the sayde Matylde, and therevpon foꝛbare. After which Dauyds death, which ensued shoꝛtly after, the Sonne of the sayde Dauyd made homage to the sayde king Stephyn.

William king of Scottes.

Fourtene yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Loꝛde. M. Cl. William king of Scottes, and Dauid his bꝛother, with all the Nobles of Scotland made homage to Henry the secondes sonne, with a reseruation of their duetie to Henry the second his father.

Xvi. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Loꝛde. M. Clxxvi. William king of Scotland, after much rebellion and resistence, accoꝛdyng to their naturall inclination, king Henry the secoud, then beyng in Noꝛmandie, William then king of Scottes knowleged finally his eꝛꝛoꝛ, and made hys peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the Nobilitie of Scotland, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within. xb. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Loꝛde. M. C. lxxxx. the sayde William king of Scottes, came to our Citie of Cauntoꝛburye, and there did homage to our noble pꝛogenitour king Rycharde the first.

Fourtene yeres after that, the sayd William did homage to our progenitour king John, vpon a hill beside Lyncolne, making his othe vpon the Crosse of Hubert then Archbishop of Cauntorbury, being there present a meruelous multitude assembled for that purpose.

Alexander king of Scottes.

Xrvj. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord. M. CC. xvj. Alexander king of Scottes maryed Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henry the thirde, at our Citie of Yorke, in the feast of Christmasse: at which time the sayde Alexander king of Scottes repayred to the sayde feast of coronation, and there did his dutie as aforesayd.

John Bayliall king of Scottes.

Within. xxviij. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. CC. lxxxij. John Balioll king of Scottes, made his homage and fealtie to the sayd king Edward the first, our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruse to vsurpe the crowne of Scotland, and to moue sedition therefore, agaynst them of the house of Baliol, which made for a season some interruption in the sayde homage: but yet no intermission without the termes of memorie. For within. xliiij. yere after, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. CCC. vj. Edwarde Balioll after a great victorie had in Scotland against the other faction, and enioying the Crowne of Scotland made homage to our progenitor Edward the thirde.

Dauid Bruse king of Scottes.

And. xx. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord. M. CCC. xxvi. Dauid Bruse, who was euer in the contrary faction, did neuertheles in the title of the Crowne of Scotland, whereof he was then in possession, make homage to our sayd progenitor Edward the thirde.

Within. ix. yeres after this, Edward the thirde, to chastice the infidelity of the Scottes, made warre against them: where after great victories, Edward Balioll hauyng the iust and right title to the realme of Scotland, surrendered clerely the same to our said progenitor at the towne of Roxisborough in Scotland: where our sayd progenitor accepted the same, and then caused himselfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a tyme entertayned it, and enioyed it, as very proprietary and owner of the realme, as on the one party by confiscation acquited, & on the other part by free will surrendred vnto him.

And then after the death of our sayd progenitor Edward the thirde, began seditions and insurrections in this our realme, in the tyme of our progenitor Richard the second, which was augmented by the alteration of the state of the sayd Richard, and the deuolution of the same, to Henry the fourth, so as the Scottes had some leysure to play their pagues, and folow their accustomed maner. And yet Henry the fift for recouery of his right in Fraunce commaunded the king of Scots to attend vpon him in that iourney. And in this time the realme of Scotland beyng descended to the house of the Stewardes, of which our Nephew directly commeth, James Steward king of Scottes, in the yere of our Lorde. M. CCCC. xxiij. made homage to Henry the first at Windsore. Which homage was distant from the tyme of the other homage made by Dauid Bruse. ix. yeres and more, but farre within the freshe memorie of man.

James Steward king of Scottes.

All which homages and fealties as they appere by story to haue beene made and done at times and season as aforesaid: so do there remaine instrumentes made therevpon and sealed with the seales of the kinges of Scotland testifiyng the same. And yet doth it appere by story, howe the Scottes practised to steale out of our treasury diuers of these instruments, which neuertheless were after recouered againe. And to the intent ye may knowe of what fourme and tenour the sayd instrumentes be, here is incerted the effect in worde and sentence as they be made, which we do, to mete with the cauellation and contriued euasion of the Scottes, allegyng the homage to haue bene made for the Erledome of Huntyngdon, which is as true as the allegation of him that is burnt in the hande, to say he was cut with a Sicle. And therefore the tenour of the homage is this.

The oth that the king of Scots taketh when he doth his homage.

I John. N. king of Scottes shall be true and faythfull vnto you Lorde Edward by the grace of God king of England, the noble and superiour Lord of the kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie of the same kingdome of Scotland, the which I holde, and clayme to holde of you: and I shall beare to you my fayth and fidelitie of life and limme, and worldly honour agaynst all men, and faythfully I shall knowlege, and shall do to you seruice due vnto you of the kingdome of Scotland aforesayd, as God so help and these holy Euangelistes.

Of this ye may reade more in the xxiij. yere of king Edward the first

Now for the thirde part touchyng recordes and registers, we haue them so formall, so autentiquall, so seriously handled, and with suche circumstances declaryng the matters, as they best ought to be a great corroboration of that hath bene in stories written and reported in this matter. For amonges other thinges, we haue the solempne act, and iudiciall processe of our progenitour Edward the first, in discussyon of the title of Scotland, when the same was chalenged by.xij. competitours: That is to say.

Florentinus comes Holandie,	Patricius Galightly.
Patricius de Dũbar comes de Merchia,	Rogerus de Mundeuille
VVillielmus de Vesty	Ioannes de Comyn.
VVillielmus de Ros	D. Ioannes de Hastinges
Robertus de Pinbeny	Ioannes de Balliolo
Nicholaus de Soules	Robertus de Bruse
	Ercius rex Norvvegie.

And finally after a great consultation and mature deliberation, wyth discussion of the allegations proponed on all parties, sentence was geuen for the tytle of Baliol, accordyng wherevnto he enioyed the realme. But for confirmation of the duetie of the homage before that tyme obserued by the king of Scottes, it appereth in those recordes howe when those competitours of the realme of Scotlande repaired to our sayde progenitor, as to the chiefe Lorde for discussion of the same, in as much as the authoritie of the iudgement to be geuen depended therevpon: It was then ordered that the whole parliament of Scotlande, spirituall, temporall and of all degrees assembled for that purpose, and considering vpon what grounde and foundation the kinges of Scotlande had in tymes past made the sayde homages and recognition of superiorittie, the sayde parliament finding the same good and true, should if they so denied it, yeelde and geue place, and by expresse consent recognise the same. At which parliament was alleged vnto them, as appereth in the same recordes, not onely these actes of the Princes before those dayes, and before rehersed: but also besides the testimonie of stories, the writyngs and letters of forreyn princes, at that time recityng and rehersyng the same: wherupon the sayde parliament did there agree to this our superiozitie, and ensuyng their determination did particularly and seue-rally make homage and fealtie with proclamation, that whosoeuer with-drewe himselfe from doyng his duetie therein, should be reputed as a rebel: And so all made homage and fealtie to our progenitor Edwarde the first. The realme of Scotland was in the time of the discussion of the title ruled by Gardians deputed by him and all Castels and holdes were surrendred to him as to the superior Lorde in the time of vacation, benefices, offices, fees, promotions passed in that time from the mere gift of our sayde progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of Englande, Shirifes named and appointed, writtes and preceptes made, obeyed, and executed: and finally all that we doe nowe in the Duchie of Lancaster, the same did our progenitor for the tyme of our contention for that tytle in the realme of Scotlande, by the con-sent of an agreement of all estates of the realme assembled and consulted with for that purpose. At which time the Bishops of saint Andrewes and Glascoo were not as they now be Archebyshops, but recognised the Arche-bishop of Yorke, which extended ouer all that Countrey.

Nowe if the Scottes will take exception to the homage of their prin-ces as made in warre and by force which is not true: what will they saye or can they for shame allege agaynst their awne parliament, not of some but of all confirmed and testefied by their writings and seales: wherevnto no-thing enforced them, but right and reason, beyng passed in peace and quyet without armour or compulsion. If they say they did it not, they speake lyke themselues, if they say they did it, then doe they now lyke themselfe, to with-drawe their duetie, not so much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appereth vnto you the beginning of the right of superiozity, with a perpetuall continuaunce, without intermission within memorie, certayne omission and forbearyng vpon the groundes and occasions before specified we denie not. Whereby they haue many times sought and taken their oppor-tunities to withdrawe the doing of their duetie in knowlege of our superiozi-tie ouer them, which to auoyde, they haue not cared what they sayde or al-leged, though it were neuer so vntrue: lyng alwayes in a wayt when they might annoy this realme, not without their awne great daunger, perill, and extreme detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their duetie, so God euer graunted vnto this realme force to compell them therevnto with-in memorie, notwithstanding any their interruption by resistence, which vnto the time of our progenitor Henry the first neuer indured so long as it made intermission within time of minde, whereby the possession might seme to be empayred, from the time of Henry the first vnto the seuenth yere of our reygne, our realme hath bene for a season lacerate and torne by diuersitie of tytles tyll oure time and hythence by warre outwardly vexed and troubled: The storp is so lamentable for some part therof, as were tedyous to reherse.

Sythen the death of our progenitor, Henry the first our Graund-father Edward the fourth reigned, who after great traueyles to attain qui-etnesse in this realme, finallye in the time of preparation of warre against Scotlande, dyed.

Richard the third then vsurped for a small time in yeres, whome the king our father by the strength of Gods hande ouerthrew in battayle, and most iustly attayned the possession this realme, who neuertheleſſe after the great great tempestious stormes, finding all matters not yet brought to a perfite quyet and rest, ceassed and forbaze to require of the Scottes to do their duty thinking it policie rather for that time to assay to tame their nature by the pleasant coniunction and conuersation of affinitie, then to charge them with their faulte, and require dutie of them, when opportunitie serued not, by force and feare to constraine and compell them.

And thus passed ouer the reigne of our father, without demaund of this homage. And beyng our reigne nowe foure and thirty yeres, we were .xxj. yere letted by our Nephew his minozite, beyng then more carefull how to bring him out of daunger, to the place of a king, then to receyue of him homage when he had full possession of the same. Wherefore beyng now passed sithens the last homage made by the king of Scottes to our progenitor Henrye the first a hundred .xxij. yeere, at which tyme the homage was done at Windesore by James Steward, then king of Scottes, as afore. lvj. of these yeres the crowne of this realme was in contention, the trouble whereof engendered also some businesse in the tyme of the king our father, which was .xxiiij. yere: And in our time .xxj. yere hath passed in the minozyte of our Nephew. So as finally the Scottes resorting to their onely defence of discontinuance of possession, can onely allege iustly but .xiij. yere of silence in the time of our reigne, being all the other times sithens the homage done by James Steward, such as the silence in them had they bene neuer so long, could not haue ingendered preiudice to the losse of any ryght, that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to king Edwarde for not demaunding homage beyng in strife for that estate, whereunto the homage was due? What should Richard the third seke for homage in Scotlande, that had neyther right ne leasure to haue homage done vnto him in England? Who can blame our father, knowyng the Scottes nature, neuer to do their dutie but for feare, if he demaunded not that of them, which they would exchue if they might, beyng his realme not clerely then purged from yll seede of sedition, sparkled and scattered in the cruell ciuile warres before.

Law and reason serueth, that the passing ouer of time not commodious to the purpose, is not allegeable in prescription for the losse of any right. And the minozitie of the king of Scottes hath endured .xxj. yeres of our reigne, which beyng an impediment on their parte, the whole prescription of the Scottes, if the matter were prescriptible, is thus deduced euidently to .xiij. yeres, which .xiij. yere without excuse we haue ceassed and forborne to demaunde our dutie, like as the Scottes haue likewise ceassed to offer and tender the same. For which cause neuertheleste we do not enter this warre, ne mi[illegible] to demaund any such matter, now beyng rather desirous to reioyce and take comfort in the friendship of our Nephew, as our neighboure, then to moue matter vnto him of displeasure, whereby to alienate such naturall inclination of loue, as he shoulde haue towarde vs. But such be the workes of God, superior ouer all, to suffer occasions to be ministred, whereby due superiozitie may be knowne, demaunded and required, to the entent that accozding thereunto all thinges gouerned in due ozder here, we maye to his pleasure passe ouer this life to his honor and glorye: which he graunt vs to do, in such rest, peace, and tranquilitie, as shall be meete and conuenient for vs.

When

The king sendeth a great armye into Scotlande.

When the king had set forth the declaration of the cause of his warre as is aboue mencioned. Then he sent forth the Duke of Norffolke Lieutenaunt generall, accompanyed with the Erles of Shrewisburie, Darby, Comberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angush, Rutland, and the Lordes of the North partes, and syr Anthony Browne Maister of the kinges Horse, Syr John Gage Comptroller of the kinges house, and twentie thousande men well appoynted, which entred Scotlande the. xxj. day of October, and taried there eyght dayes without battayle, and brent the townes of Parton, Ramrige, Styne, Gradyn, Shyelles, Lang Ednem, Newton, Skitshell, Newthorne, Smellem Spittle, the two Werdens, Sledertike, and the two Broxlawes, Flozys and the Faire Croste, Edeem Spittell, Rorbozough, Kelsey and the Abbey, Lang Spzonstow, Ryden, & Hadyngton. And while the Duke was at Farneton in Scotland, ỳ fourth day there came to speake with him halfe a myle from the hoste, from the king of Scottes, the Bishop of Orkeney and James Leiremouth Master of the houshold, to entreate peace, but they agreed not. And the armye lay so longe in Scotland as they might for hunger and colde without any countenaunce of harme, and so for necessitie returned to Barwicke. And all this iourney the Standard of the Erle of Hampton which died at new Castell was borne in the forewarde, because he was appoynted Capitaine of the same.

The king of Scottes heerynge that the armie was returned, rayled an armie of. xb. thousand chosen men of all partes of his realme vnder the guydynge of the Lord Marwell Wardeyn of his west Marches, bosting to tarry as long in England, as the Duke did in Scotland. And so on Friday beyng Saint Katherynes euen, they passed ouer the water of Esk, and brent certaine houses of the Greues on the very border. Thomas bastard Dacres with Jacke of Mulgraue sent worde to sir Thomas Wharton Wardeyn for the king on the west Marches, to come on to succor them: howbeit the sayde two valiant Captaines, although the Scots entred fiercely, yet they manfully and courageously set on them, with an hundred light horse, and left a stale on the syde of a hill, where withall the Scottes were wonderfully dismayde, eyther thinkyng that the Duke of Norffolk had bene come to the West marches with his great armie, or else they thought that some greater armie came, namely when they espyed sir Thomas Wharton, commyng with three hundred men only. But at that time, so God ordeined it to be, that they at the first brent fled, and the Englishmen folowed, and there were taken prisoners the Erles of Casselles, and Glancarne, the Lorde Marwell, Admirall and Wardein, the Lord Flemmyng, the Lorde Sommerwell, the Lorde Olyphant, the Lord Gray, sir Oliuer Senclere the kinges minion, John Rosse Lord Dragy, Robert Esky̓n sonne to the Lorde Esky̓n, Carre Lorde of Gredon, the Lorde Marwelles two brethren, John Lesley Bastard to the Erle of Rothus, and two hundred Gentlemen more, and aboue. viij. hundred common people, insomuch that some one man, yea, and women had three or foure prisoners. They tooke also. cxiiij. Gunnes, foure Cartes with speares, and ten pauilions. This was onely the handstroke of God, for the Cardinall of Scotland promised them heauen for destruction of England.

A great number of the Nobilitie of Scotland taken prisoners

This was called the battaile of Solemne Wasse.

The death of the Scottish king.

The king of Scottes tooke a great thought for this discomfiture, and also because that an English Herauld called Sommerset was slain at Dumbarre, warre, which things together he tooke so vnpacientlye, that he dyed in a frensie. Although many reported that the king himselfe was at this bickeryng, and there receyued his deathes wound, and fled therewith into Scotlande. But howsoeuer it was, true it is as is afore sayde he dyed, and the Quene his wyfe was deliuered of a daughter, on our Ladie euen before Christmas called Mary. Of the prisoners afore sayd. xxiiij. of the chiefe of them, were brought vp to the Tower of London, and there were two dayes. And on saint Thomas day the Apostle before Christmalle, they were solempnly conueyed through London to Westminster, where the kinges Counsaile sate, and there the Lord Chauncelor, declared to them their vntruth, vnkindnesse, and false dissimulation, declaryng farther how the king had cause of warre against them, both for the denying of their homages, and also for their trayterous inuasions without defiaunce, and also for kepping his subiectes prisoners without redemption, contrary to the olde lawes of the Marches, for which doynges, God as they might perceyue had scourged them: Howbeit the king more regardyng his honour, then his Princely power, was content to shewe to them kindnesse, for vnkindnesse, and right for wrong. And although he might haue kept them in straight prison, by iust lawe of Armes, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme, in their houses. And so accordyng to their estates, they were appointed to Dukes, Erles, Bishops, Knightes and other Gentlemen, which so entertained them, that they confessed themselues neuer to be better entertained nor to haue had greater chere. But after their new gladnes, tidyngs came to them, of the death of their king, which they sore lamented, and hearyng that he had left an only daughter his heyre, they wished her in England, to be maried to the prince the kings sonne. The king and his Counsaile, perceiuyng the ouerture nowe to be made, which way without warre these two realmes might be brought into one, sent for all the prisoners few lackyng, to his Manor of Hampton Court, on saint Stephens day, where they were so well entertayned, both of the king and his nobles, that they sayd, they neuer saw king but him, and sayd that God was better serued here, then in their Countrey: howbeit their Kirkmen preached, that in England was neither Masse, nor any seruice of God. And they promised the king, to do al that in them lay with their friendes to performe asmuch as he required. Whereupon not without great rewardes, they departed toward Scotland on Newyeres day, and by the way they saw the Prince, and came to Newecastell to the Duke of Suffolke, who vpon hostages deliuered them, and so they entered Scotland and were well and gladly welcomed.

The birth of Mary daughter to the king of Scotes.

The first motion of the mariage of the heyre of Scotland with prince Edwardes heire of England began of the Scottes.

Likewise the Erle of Angus, which was banished Scotland, and had of the kinges fee, yerely a thousande marke, and Sir George Douglas hys brother had fiue hundreth Marke. These were accepted into Scotland, and restored by the last kinges will, and the Erle of Angus and diuers of the Lordes that were prisoners, were made of the priuie Counsaile of the realme, by the Erle of Arrein, gouernor of the yong Queene, and the realme, as next heire apparaunt: notwithstandyng that the Archebishop of Saint Andrewes and Cardinal, enemie mortal to the king and realme of England, for the Bishop of Romes auctoritie (and partly set on by the French king, for the same cause) had forged a will, that the king had made him Gouernour, uernour, associate with two Erles of his affinitie, both of the realme and of the yong Queene, contrary to the lawes of Scotland. Wherevpon the sayd Erle of Arrain, according to his right, with the helpe of his friendes, tooke vpon him the rule of Gouernor, and put the sayde false Cardinall in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes and other prisoners, by their bandes, according to the custome of the Marches. And so in March next following, the Scottes began their Parliament.

All this yere there was neither perfite peace, nor open warre, betwene England and Fraunce, but ships were taken on both sydes, and Marchants robbed. And at the last the Marchauntes goodes on both parties were seased, and likewise the Ambassadors of both realmes were stayed: howbeit shortly after, the Ambassadors were deliuered, but yet the Marchauntes were robbed, and no warre proclaymed.

In the end of this yere, came from the Gouernor of Scotlande as Ambassadors, sir William Hambleton, James Leyzmouth, and the Secretorie of Scotland, whose message was so meanely liked, that they were faine to sende an Herauld into Scotland, for other Ambassadors, and so hether came the Erle of Glancarne, and sir George Douglas, and whatsoeuer their answere was, sir George returned in post, and within .xx. dayes, came againe with an honest answere, but that honestie endured a small tyme.

A peace concluded betweene the Emperour and the king of England.

In the beginning of this yere on Trinitie Sonday, was a new league sworne betwene the king and the Emperor at Hampton Court, to be friends to their friendes, and enemies to their enemies.

Certaine Irish Lords come into England.

The thirde daye of June came to the Court, from the realme of Irelande, the Lorde Obryn, the Lorde Macke Wylliam Brough, the Lorde Macke Gilpatrick. And in July the sayde Obryn was created Erle of Townon, and Lorde Macke Wylliam was created Erle of Clanrikard, and syr Donon Obryn was made Baron of Ebranky, and so with rewardes they toke their leaue, and returned. Also the same Moneth the Scottishe Ambassadours returned with great rewardes.

warre with Fraunce.

At this season the king and the Emperour sent Garter and Teyson kings at armes to demaund certayne things of the French king, which if he did denie, then to defie him, but he would not suffer them to come within his lande, and so they returned. Wherevpon the sayde demaunds were shewed to the Imbassador at Westminster. And in July the king sent ouer fiue thousand tall men, whereof was Capitayne generall, syr John Wallop, and syr Thomas Seymour Marshall, and syr Richarde Cromwell Capitayne of the horsemen, which assaulted a towne called Laundersey, vnto the which assault came the Emperour in proper person. And shortly after came downe the French king in proper person with a great armie, and offered the Emperour battayle, by reason whereof the siege was raysed, and streight the Frenchmen battayled the towne, which was the onely cause of their comming. For the next day the Emperor beyng redie at the houre appointed to geue battail, the french men made great shew, as though they would haue come forward, but they dalyed of al that day, and in the night they ran away, and trusted some to their horses, and some to their legges lyke tall felowes.

Launderſey.

And in this time by reason of a statute that was lately made, commonly called the statute of fiue articles, there was many men in trouble namely at Wyndsore, but for this and suche other that concerne religion, I referre you to the boke of the monuments of the Church published by maister Fox.

The Lords of Scotland who in the last yere (as you haue heard) were taken prisoners in England were at New yeres tyde released and sent home raunsome free into Scotland vpon their othes and promise to do that in them lay for the cõclusion of a mariage to be had betweene Mary the sole and only heyre of Scotland, and Edward the prince and heyre of England, who immediatly vpõ there returne did cause to be sommoned & conuocated a parliament in Scotland, and in the same concluded, agreed & determined the aforesaid mariage, and confirming their act vnder their great seale, sent the same vnto king Henry the eyght. And for the better conclusion and solemnization thereof: there was time and place appointed: But herevnto the Cardinal of saint Andrewes would not agree: wherefore the Lordes committed him to safe custodie, and shortly after by the meanes of the French king, the Lords of Scotlande went from all that they had done, and namely the Lorde Hamelton the gouernour, who went both from his othe and promise, the which was the occasion that king Henry made agayne newe prouision for warre, and sent into Scotlande a great power to their no little losse and detriment, as in the yere next folowyng shall be shewed.

Thys yeare was in London a great death of the pestilence, and therefore Wighelmas terme was adiourned to saint Albons, and there was it kept to the ende.

Wighelmas terme kept at saint Albones

In the weke of Christmasse came to the king to Hampton Court Ferdinando de Gonzaga Viceroy of Cicile prince of Malfeta Duke of Juano Cappytaine generall of the chiualrie and armie of the Emperour Charles, which came to the king to appoint what time the armie and the Emperour should be readie to inuade Fraunce, and the appointment taken he departed, and had for his reward a. C. liij. ounces in golden plate, and foure thousand three ounces in guylt plate, which all was very curiously wrought. And all the time that he lay here, he lay at the kings cost.

The Sonday before Christmas was Lord William Parre, brother to the Queene, which had maried the daughter and heyre of Lorde Henrye Burchier Erle of Essex, at Hampton Court, created Erle of Esser. And sir Willyam Parre knight Uncle to them both, was made Lorde Parre of Horton and Chaumberlayne to the Queene. And on Newyeares day was syr Thomas Wryothesley the kinges secretarie, made Lorde Wryothesley of Tychefield.

Also this yeare was open warre proclaymed with Fraunce, and lycence geuen to the kinges subiectes to seaze vpon the French men and their goodes as in lyke cases before had bene accustomed.

This yere the king sent a great armie into Scotlande by sea, and he made the Erle of Hertford Lieutenaunt generall of the same. And the Vicount Lisle high Admyrall, which valyaunt Capitaynes so sped them, that the third day of May the Lorde Admirall arriued with all his Fleete, which was two. C. sayle in the Fryth, where he landed dyuers of his men, and there tooke dyuers vessels, which after did high seruice. And shortly they approched vnto the towne of Lyth where they landed their men, and marched forwarde in three great battayles, whereof the Lorde Admirall led the vawarde, warde, the Erle of Shrewsbury the arrerewarde, and the Noble Erle of Hertford being Lieutenaunt, of the battail: Where they founde the Scottes assembled to the number of fiue thousande horsemen beside footemen to stop the passage of the armie. And at the first the Scottes made toward the Englishe men as though they would haue set on the vawarde, but when they perceyued the Englishe men so wylling to encounter with them, namely the Cardinall who was there present, whiche perceyued the deuotion the Englishe men had to see his holynesse, after certayne shot on both sides, they made a sodayne retreate, and leanyng their artillary behinde them fled towarde Edenborough. The first man that fled was the Cardinall lyke a valyaunt Champion, and with him the Gouernour, the Erle of Huntley, Murrey and Bothwell, with many other great men of the realme. And shortly after the Englishe men mauger all the Scottes might doe, entered the towne of Lith where that night the army encamped them, and there they found such riches as they thought not to haue founde in any towne of Scotland.

Lith taken and spoyled.

The next day the Armye went towardes Edenborough towne, and when they approched nere, the Prouost of the towne accõpanied with one or two Burgesses, and two or three Officers at armes desired to speake with the kings Lieutenant, and in the name of all the towne said, that the keyes of the towne shoulde be deliuered vnto his Lordeship conditionally that they might go with bag and baggage and the towne to be saued from fier: Whervnto aunswere was made by the sayd Lieutenaunt, that where as the Scots had so manifestly broken their promises confirmed by othes and Seales and certefied by the whole Parliament, as is euidently knowne to the whole worlde, he was sent thether by the kinges highnesse to take vengeaunce of their detestable falshoode, to declare and shewe the force of his highnesse swoorde to all such as should make any resistaunce vnto his graces power sent thether for that purpose: And therefore he tolde to them resolutely that vnlesse they would yelde vp the towne frankely without condicion, and cause man, woman and childe, to issue into the fieldes, submitting them to his wyll and pleasure, he woulde put them to the swoord and their towne to the fyer. The Prouost aunswered that it were better for them to stande to their defence. Wherevpon commaundement was geuen to the sayd Prouost and Officers at Armes vpon their perill to depart. And foorthwith the Lorde Lieutenaunt sent to the vaward that they should march towardes the towne which corragiously set forwarde, and the English Gonners manfully set on the gates, specially sir Christopher Morice, that they did beate the Scottes from their Ordinaunce, and so entred the gate called Cany gate by fine force and there slew a great number of the Scottes: And finally it was determined by the sayd Lorde Lieutenaunt vtterly to ruinate and destroy the sayde towne with fier, which thing immediatly was attempted, but because night was come, the army withdrew to their campe, & then a fresh the next day set fyer where none was before, which continued that day and two dayes after burning. And shortely after came vnto this armye by lande foure thousand light horsemen sent by the king, which after they were come, the army forsoke their shippes and sent them whome laden with spoyle and Gunshot which they found there, and dislodged their Campe out of the towne of Lith, and set fier in euery house, and brent it to the ground: and so returned home whole therein: and so sore was layde to the charge of the Frenchmen that after the kyng had assaulted them by the space of a Month, they sent forth of the towne to the king two of their chiefe Capitaynes, called Sembiemound, and Mounsire de Haies, which declared that the chiefe Capitayne of the towne with his retinue was contented to delyuer the towne vnto his grace, so that they might passe with bagge and baggage, which request the kings maiestie, mercifully graunted them. And so on the next day, the Duke of Suffolke rode into Bulleyn, to whome in the kings name, they delyuered the keyes of the towne. And at after none departed out of Bulleyne all the Frenche men. C. lxii. of Gonners eyght hundred, of hurtmen. lxxxvij. of women and children. xix. C. xxvij: So there was in al that came out of the towne, foure thousand, foure hundred, fiftie and foure, beside a great number of aged, sicke, and hurt persons, that was not able to go forth of the towne. The last person that came forth, was Monsire de Veruine, graund Capitaine of the towne, which when he approched neere the place where the king stoode, he alighted from his horse, and came to the king. And after he had talked with him a space, the king toke him by the hand, & he reuerently kneling vpon his knees, kissed his hand, & afterward mounted vpon hys horse, & so departed.

In this yere alſo the kinges Maieſtie pꝛepared two great armies to Fraunce, the one was conducted and led by the Duke of Noꝛffolke, and the gentle Loꝛde Ruſſell Loꝛde pꝛiuie ſeale, which encamped at Muttrell and beſieged the towne, where they laye a long time, and left the towne as they founde it: The other armie was led by the valyaunt Duke of Suffolke which was the kings Luetenaunt of that armie, and beyng accompanied with the Loꝛde Chamberleyn, the Erle of Arondell Marſhall of the field, and ſyꝛ John Gage Comptroller of the kings houſe, & ſyꝛ Anthony Bꝛowne maiſter of the kings hoꝛſes, with dyuers & many other Capitaynes: the .xix. day of July encamped beſoꝛe Bulleyn on the Eaſt ſide of the ſame vpon the hill, where after many ſharpe ſkirmiſches they gayned firſt the olde man, and ſhoꝛtly after baſſe Boleyn.

The. xvij. day, the kings highnesse hauing the sworde borne naked before him, by the Lorde Marques Dorset, like a noble and valyaunt Conquerour rode into Bulleyn, and all the Trompetters standing on the walles of the towne, sounded their Trumpets, at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the kings true subiectes, the same beholdyng. And in the enteryng, there met him the Duke of Suffolke, and delyuered vnto him the keyes of the towne, & so he roade toward his lodgyng, which was prepared for him on the South syde of the towne. And within two dayes after, the king rode about all the towne within the walles, and commaunded that our Lady Church of Bulleyn, should be defaced & plucked downe, where he appointed a Mount to be made, for the great force & strength of the towne.

The kinges enterance into Bulleyn.

When the king had set all thinges there in suche order, as to his wisedome was thought best, he returned, to the great reioysing of all his louing subiectes.

In the meane season, that the king lay before Bulleyn, and was like to haue conquered the same, as at the last he did, as before you haue heard, the Emperour tooke a peace with the Frenche king, to the no little griefe and displeasure of the kinges Maiestie, and that was the cause that the king so sodainly brake vp his armie, aswell at Bulleyne, as also at Mutterell, and so he returned.

Shortly after, diuers and many sharpe skirmishes were made by the Frenchmen at Bulleyn namely by the Dolphyn, who with a great power in the night season stale vpon Base Bulleyn, taking there a great sort of sicke persons, and women in there beddes, whome without mercy they slue. Howbeit so manfully the Englishmen, which escaped out of Base Bulleyn behaued themselues, getting weapons out of the highe towne, that they beate the Frenche men againe out of the Base Towne, and after with the helpe of the high towne, they slue a great number of them, and so againe possessed ſelled quietly, the ſayd Baſe towne: Beſyde I ſay this ſkirmiſhe and many mo, Mounſire de Bees came with. xb. thouſand men, and encamped right againſt the towne on the other ſyde of the water, entendyng there to haue builded a foꝛt. But the fourth day of Febꝛuary, he was ſet vpon in his owne Campe, by the moſt valiant and foꝛtunate Erle of Hertfoꝛd, and Lord Liſle, the Lorde Gray and other: at whoſe commyng the ſayde Monſire de Bees, with all his puyſſaunce fled, leauyng behinde them all their Oꝛdinaunce, Tentes, and Plate.

The beuilding of the newe Foꝛte at Bullcine.

The ſeuenth day of June, a great armie of Frenchmen, came nere to the hauen of Bulleyn, and ſkirmiſhed with the Engliſhe men, to the no great gaine of the Frenchmen: but this armie which was accoumpted to the number of. xx. thouſande there encamped, began againe to builde a Foꝛt, which beſoꝛe they departed accompliſhed the ſame.

In June the Lorde Liſle Admirall of England, with the Engliſhe fleete entered the mouth of Sain, and came beſoꝛe new Hauen, where the great armie of Fraunce lay, which were two hundꝛed ſhippes, and. xxbj. Gallyes of foꝛce, whereof the Biſhop of Rome had ſent. xx. well furniſhed with men and money, to ayde the French king. The Engliſhmen beyng but an hundꝛed. lx. ſaile, and all great ſhippes, did not determine to ſet on the whole naue, but ſhot certaine peeces of oꝛdinaunce at them, which cauſed the Gallies to come abꝛoade, and ſhot at the Engliſhemen, which Galies had great aduauntage, by reaſon of the calme weather: twiſe ethe part aſſaulted other with oꝛdinaunce, but ſodainly the winde roſe ſo great, that the Galies coulde not endure the rage of the ſeas: and the Engliſhemen were compelled to enter the maine ſeas, foꝛ feare of flattes, and ſo ſayled vnto Poꝛteſmouth, where the king then lay, foꝛ he had knowlege by his eſpials, that the French armie entended to land in the Iſle of Wight, wherefoꝛe he repayꝛed to that coſt to ſee his realme defended.

After the departyng of the Engliſhe naue from Newe hauen, the Admirall of Fraunce, called the Lorde Danibalt, a man of great experience, haiſed vp his ſayles, and with his whole naue, came to the poynt of the Iſle of Wight, called Saint Helenes poynt, and there in good oꝛder caſt their Ankers, and ſent. xbj. of his Galies daily to the very Hauen of Poꝛteſmouth. The Engliſh naue liyng in the hauen, made them pꝛeſt and ſet out towards them, and ſtil the one ſhot at the other. But one day aboue al other, the whole naue of the Engliſhemen made out, and purpoſed to ſet on the Frenchmen: but in their ſettyng foꝛward, a goodly ſhippe of Englande called the Maꝛye Roſe, was by to much folly dꝛowned in the middes of the Hauen, foꝛ ſhe was laden with to much oꝛdinaunce, and the poꝛtes left open, which were beꝛye low, and the great oꝛdinaunce vnbꝛeeched, ſo that when the ſhip ſhould turne the water entered, and ſodainly ſhe ſanke. In her was Sir Geoꝛge Carewe knight, Capitaine of the ſayde ſhippe, and foure hundꝛed men, and much oꝛdinaunce.

The Maꝛye Roſe dꝛowned.

Sir Geoꝛge Carew knight dꝛowned.

At the ſame tyme certaine of the Frenchmen landed in the Iſle of Wight, where there Capitaine was ſlaine and many other, and were both to theyꝛ great loſſe and paine, dꝛiuen againe to their Gallyes.

The king perceiuyng the great nauy of the French men to appꝛoch, ſent letters foꝛ men into Hampſhire, Sommerſet ſhire, Wilſhire, and diuers other places adioynyng: which repayred to his presence in great numbers, well furnished with armure and vitaile, and all thinges necessarie, so that the Isle was garnished, and all the Frontiers on the Sea coast, furnished with men in great number.

The French Capitaines hauyng knowlege, by certain fishermen which they tooke, that the king was present, and also of the great power that he had in redinesse, they disankred, and sayled alonges the coastes of Suller, and a smal number of them landed in Suller, which neuer returned to their ships, for they were taken vp by the way.

When they had searched all the coast, and saw men euer redie to receiue them, they turned the sterne, and returned home again, without any act worthie to be written, done, or enterprised: sauyng that in this meane time they re new Fort against Bulleyn, was strongly furnished and finished.

The number of the Frenchmen, as diuers prisoners that were taken in the Isle of Wight, and in Suller did report, were. lx.M. And at this tyme the French king wrote to the Emperor, and declared to him that his armye had gotten the Isle of Wight, the Portes of Hampton, & Portesmouth, and diuers other places, which writyng was as true, as the French king hath in all his leagues and promises bene to the king of England.

The Erle of Hertford entered with an armie into Scotland.

In August folowyng, the noble Erle of Hertford entered againe into Scotland, with. xij. thousand men, and destroyed all the townes in the middle Marches, and passed to the west Marches, to the great detriment and losse of Scotland, and destroied Coldingham Abbey: and yet the Frenchmen and Scottes which lay at Kelsey, durst not once encounter with him.

The death of Charles duke of Suffolke.

In this Moneth died Charles, the noble and valiaunt Duke of Suffolke, a hardie Gentleman, and yet not so hardie, as almost of all estates and degrees of men, high and low, rich and poore, hartily beloued, and his death of them much lamented, he was buryed at Windsore.

A Parliament.

The. xxiiij. day of Nouember, a Parliament began at Westminster, by authoritie whereof, was graunted to the king a subsedie of two shillinges viij. pence of the pound, of moueable goodes, and foure shillinges the pounde in lande, to be payed in two yere. And all Colleges, Chaunteries, and Hospitals, were committed to the kings order, duryng his lyfe, to alter and transpose: which his grace at the prorogation of the Parliament, promysed to do to the glorie of God, and the common profite of the realme.

Treyport burned.

A little before this tyme, the noble and valiaunt Lord Lisle, Lorde Admirall, landed in Normandie, and brent the suburbs of Treyport, and dyuers villages along the Sea coast, and destroyed and tooke almost all the shippes in the hauen, which was a riche and a goodly praye, and so returned without any dammage.

The French king sore moued with these doynges, sent Mounsire de Bees with. xij. M. men, which entered into the English pale, beside Graueslyn, and brent Marke and diuers small villages, and then returned.

Euer in maner were skirmishes and Alarmes betweene high Bulleyn, and the new buylded Fortresse, but the losse ranne euer on the Frenchmens side.

This yere was meanes made by the Emperor, that certaine Ambassadors of England and Fraunce might mete to common of a peace, whereupon the king of England sent to Guisnes, Cuthert Bishop of Durisme, sir William am Paget his Secretozy, and doctoz Tregonell. And the French king sent to Arde a Bishop, the chiefe pzesident of Roan, and a Notarie, but no conclusion came to effect. Wherefoze the king hauyng perfite knowlege, howe the Frenchmen intended to builde a newe Foztresse on Saint Johns rode, betweene Bullein and Calice: which thyng had not onely soze distrussed Calice, but daply had put Bulleyn in trouble. Wherefoze he meanyng to pzeuent so great a mischiefe, sent ouer the noble Erle of Hertfozd, and the valiant Lozd Lisle Admirall, and many valiaunt Capitaynes, with seuen thousand good Souldiozs, which gat the rode but two dayes befoze the Frenche men appoynted to haue bene there, and in that place encamped themselues. Mounsire de Bees leader and conducter of all the French affayzes, encamped himselfe beside Hardilow, and durst not once come fozth to set on our men, notwithstanding his fozmer pzeparation and deuice.

The Erle of Hertfozd and the Lozde Lisle sent to Bulleyn.

These thynges thus hangyng, many great skirmishes were dayly betweene the Bullenois, and the French Bastilion: and one day the one part lost and the other gayned, and likewise the losers regayned: but in one skirmishe were lost.xvj. English Gentlemen, and.lxxx. other, although there were slain three raskall Frenchmen, and in this skirmishe was slaine, sir George Pollard. And in a like tournay was slain sir Rauke Elderkare, Capitaine of the light hozsemen, with a fewe other Englishmen, but yet a great multitude of French men, at that tyme lay on the grounde.

Sir George Pollard slain Sir Rauke Elderkare slaine.

The.xxiiij. day of December, the kinges Maiestie came to the Parliament house, to geue his ropall assent, to such actes as there had passed, where was made vnto him by the Speaker, an eloquent ozation, to the which it hath euer bene accustomed, that the Lozd Chauncelloz made aunswer, but at this time it was the kinges pleasure, that it should be otherwise, foz the king himselfe made him aunswere, as foloweth wozde foz wozde, as nere as I was able to repozt it.

King Henry the eight his aunswere to the speaker of the Parliament.

Although my Chancelloz foz the tyme beyng, hath befoze this tyme vsed, very eloquently and substantially, to make aunswere to such ozations, as hath beene set fozth in this highe Court of Parliament, yet is he not so able to open and set fozth my mynde and meanyng, and the secretes of my heart, in so plaine and simple maner, as I my selfe am and can do: wherefoze I takyng vpon me to aunswer your eloquent ozation Maister Speaker, say that where you in the name of our welbeloued Commons, hath both praysed and extolled me, foz the notable qualities, that you haue conceyued to be in me, I most hartily thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembzaunce of my duetie, which is to endeuoz my selfe to obteine and get such excellent qualities, and necessarie vertues, as a Pzince oz Gouernour should oz ought to haue, of which giftes I recognise my selfe, both bare and barrein: but of such small qualities, as God hath endued me withall, I render to his goodnesse my most humble thankes, entendyng with all my wit and diligence, to get and acquire to me such notable vertues, and pzincely qualities, as you haue alleged to be incozpozate in my person: These thankes foz your louyng admonition and good counsaile first remembzed, I eftsones thanke you againe, bezause that you considerying our great charges (not foz our pleasure, but foz your defence, not foz our gaine, but to our great cost) which we haue lately susteyned, aswell in defence of our and your enemies, as foz the conquest of

that

that Fortresse, which was to this realme most displeasant and noysome, and shall be by Gods grace hereafter, to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue freely of your awne myndes, graunted to vs a certaine subsedie, here in an act specifyed, which verily we take in good part, regardyng more your kindnesse, then the profite thereof, as he that setteth more by your louyng hartes, then by your substaunce. Besyde this hartie kindnesse, I cannot a little reioyce when I consider, the perfite trust and sure confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauyng vndoubted hope, and vnfeyned beliefe in my good doynges, and iust procedynges for you, without my desyre or request, haue committed to mine order and disposition all Chauntryes, Colleges, Hospitals, and other places specified in a certaine act, firmely trustyng that I will order them to the glory of God, and the profite of the common welth. Surely if I contrary to your expectation, should suffer the ministers of the Church to decay, or learnyng (which is so great a Juell) to be minished, or poore and miserable people, to be vnrelieued, you might say that I beyng put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable man to mine euen Christian, neither a louer of the publike welth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome accompt must be rendered of all our doynges. Doubt not I pray you, but your expectation shall be serued, more Godly and goodly then you will wishe or desyre, as hereafter you shall plainly perceyue.

Now sithence I finde such kindnesse, on your part toward me, I cannot chose, but loue and fauor you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoreth his Subiectes, then I do you, nor no subiectes or Commons more loue and obaye their souereigne Lord, then I perceyue you do me, for whose defence my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require my persone shall not be vnaduentured: yet although I wyth you, and you with me, be in this perfite loue and concorde, this friendely amytie cannot continue, except both you my Lordes temporall, and you my Lordes spirituall, and you my louing subiectes, studie and take paine to amende one thing, which surely is amys, and far out of order, to the which I most hartely require you, which is, that charitie and concord is not amongest you, but discorde and dissencion, bereth rule in euery place, Saint Paule sayeth to the Corinthians, and in the .xiij. Chapiter, Charity is gentle Charitie is not enuious, Charitie is not proude, and so forth in the sayde Chapiter: Beholde then what loue and Charitie is amongst you, when the one calleth the other Heretick and Anabaptist, and he calleth him againe Papist, Ypocrite and Pharasey. Be these tokens of charitie amongst you? Are these signes of fraternall loue betweene you? No, no, I assure you, that this lacke of charitie amongst your selfes, will be the hinderaunce and asswaging, of the feruent loue betweene vs, as I sayde before, except this would be salued, and clerely made whole. I must nedes iudge the faulte and occasion of this discorde, to be partly by negligence, of you the fathers and Preachers of the spiritualtie. For if I know a mā which liueth in adultery, I must iudge him a lecherous and a carnall persone: If I se a man boast and brag himselfe, I cannot but deeme him a proud man. I se here dayly that you of the clergye preache one agaynst another, teach one contrary to another, inueigh one against another without charitie or discrecion. Some be to stiffe in their olde Mumpsimus, other be to busy and curyous, in their new Sumpsimus. Thus all men almost be in varietie and discorde, and few or none preach truly and sincerely the worde of God, according as they ought to do. Shall I iudge you charitable persones doyng this? No no, I cannot so do: alas how can the poore soules liue in concorde, when you preachers sow amongst them in your sermons, debate and discorde? Of you they looke for light, and you bring them to darkenesse. Amend these crimes I exhorte you, and set forth Gods worde both by true preaching and good example geuing, or else I whom God hath appointed his Vicare, and high minister here, will se these deuisions extinct, and these enormities corrected, according to my very dutie, or else I am an vnprofitable seruaunt, and an vntrue officer.

Although I say the spirituall men be in some faulte, that charitie is not kept amongest you, yet you of the temporaltie, be not cleane and vnspotted of malice and enuy, for you raile on Bishops, speake slaunderously of Priestes, and rebuke and taunt Preachers, both contrary to good order, and Christian fraternitie. If you know surely that a Bishop or Preacher, erreth or teacheth peruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our Counsayle or to vs, to whome is committed by God the high authoritie to reforme and order such causes and behauiours: and be not iudges your selues, of your owne phantasticall opinions, and vaine expositions, for in such high causes ye may lightly erre. And although you be permitted to reade holy Scripture and to haue the worde of God in your mother tongue, you must vnderstand that it is licensed you so to doe, onely to informe your owne conscience, and to instruct your children and family, and not to dispute and make Scripture a rayling and taunting stocke, against Priestes and Preachers (as many light persons do) I am very sory to knowe and here, how vnreuerently that most precious iewell the word of God is disputed, rymed, song, and iangeled in euery Alehouse and Tauerne, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same. And yet I am euen as much sorye, that the readers of the same, folow it in doyng so faintly and coldely: for of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so faynt amongst you, and verteous and godly liuing was neuer lesse vsed, nor God himselfe amongst Christians was neuer lesse reuerenced honored, or serued. Therefore as I sayde before, be in charitie one with an other, like brother and brother, loue dred and serue God (to the which I as your supreme heade, and souereigne Lorde, exhorte and require you) and then I doubt not, but that loue and league, that I spake of in the beginning shall neuer be dissolued or broken betweene vs. And to the making of lawes which be now made and concluded, I exhorte you the makers, to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making and furthering of the same, or else your labor shalbe in vaine, and your common welth nothing relieued. Now to your petition, concerning our royall assent, to be geuen to such actes as hath passed both the houses. They shall be read openly, that ye may heere them. Then were they openly read, and to many his grace assented, and diuers he assented not vnto. This the kinges Oration was to his Subiectes there present such comfort, that the like ioye coulde not be vnto them in this world. And thus the actes reade, as the maner is, and his assent geuen, his grace rose and departed.

In this time there was by the Frenche men, a voyage made towarde

the Isle of Bzasile, with a ship called the Barcke Ager, which they had taken from the Englishe men before. And in their way they fortuned to meete sodainely with a little Craer, of whome was mayster one Goldyng, which Goldyng was a feat and hardie man. The Barke perceyuing thys small Craer to be an Englishe man, shot at him and bouged him, wherefore the Craer drewe straight to the great ship, and sixe or seuen of the men lept into the Barcke. The Frenchmen looking ouer the boorde at the sinking of the Craer, nothing mistrusting any thing that might be done by ỳ Englishmen. And so it fortuned that those Englishmen, which clymed into the ship, found in the end therof a great nũber of lime pots, which they with water quenched, or rather as the nature therof is, set them a fyre, & threw them at the French men that were aborde, and so blynded them, that those few Englishmen that entered the ship, banquished all that were therin, and drawe them vnder hatches, and brought the Barke clerely away agayne into England.

A peace concluded betwene England and Fraunce.

In the Monthe of Aprill, by meanes of dyuers princes, an assemble was had, betwene both the realmes of Englande and Fraunce at Guysnes and Arde. There were for the king of Englande, the Erle of Hertford, the Lorde Lisle Admirall, Sir Wylliam Paget Secretary, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Cauntorbury. And for the Frenche king, the Lorde Clado Doneball Admyrall and Marshall of Fraunce, the Byshop of Eureux, a President and a Secretary. After long debating and diuers breches, a peace was concluded, and proclaymed in the kinges Courte, and in the Citie of London on Whitsonday, with sound of Trompettes. And lykewise was it done at Parys and Roan. For the performaunce wherof, the Viscount Lisle Admyrall, wyth the Bishop of Bureisme, and dyuers Lordes, and aboue an hundred Gentlemen, all in Ueluet coates and cheynes of golde, went to Parys, and were there solemply receyued and feasted, and shortly returned.

Ambassadors of Fraunce.

After whose returne, the Admirall of Fraunce, accompanyed wyth the Byshop of Eureux, the Erles of Naunteuile, and Villiers, and dyuers great Lordes, beside two hundred gentlemen well appoynted, tooke hys Galey at Deepe, and hauyng in his companie twelue fayre Galies, well trimmed and decked, sayled into Englande, and neuer tooke lande, tyll he came to Grenewiche, where he was receyued by the Erles of Esser, and Darby, the .xix. day of August. And the next daye, he with all his Galies, landed at the Tower Wharfe, and on all the bankes by the water syde, laye peeces of ordinaunce which shot of, but especially the Tower of London, where was shot a terrible peale of ordinaunce. And from thence he roade through London, in great triumph, the Mayor and the craftes standyng in the streetes in good order, to the Byshops Palace of London, where he lodged till Bartholmew euen, on which day he was conueyed toward Hamptõ Court, where in the waye the prince hauing with him the Archebyshop of Yorke, the Erles of Hertforde, and Huntyngdon, and aboue two thousand horse, met him and enbraced him, in such lowly and honorable maner, that all the beholders greatly reioyced and much maruayled at hys wit and audacitie, and so he came to the Court, geuing the prince the vpper hande as he rode. And at the vtter gate of the Court, the Lorde Chauncelor, and all the kinges counsayle receyued him, and brought him to his lodgyng.

On Bartholomew daye, the king richely appareled, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the Chapel, where the league was swoorne and signed. To tell you of the costly banquet houses that were buylt, and of the great banquets, the costly Maskes, the liberall huntyngs that were shewed to hym, you would much maruaile, and scant beleue. But on Fryday folowyng, he beyng rewarded with a Cubboorde of Plate, to the value of twelue hundred pounde, returned to London, and on Monday tooke his Galies and departed. Beside this dyuers of his companie, had much plate, and manye horses and Greyhounds geuen them. Also the Admirall had geuen to hym, of the Citie of London, two Flagons guilt, & two parcell guilt, to the somme of an hundred and sixe and thirtie pounde, beside Wine, Ware, and Torches: and thus with liberall rewardes and honorable entertainment they returned into Fraunce.

Although this peace pleased both the English & the French nations, yet surely both mistrusted the continuaunce of the same, considering the old prouerbe, that which the eye seeth, the hart rueth, for the French men stil longed for Bulleyn, and the Englishemen minded not to geue it ouer: in so much as during the Admyrals of Fraunce beyng in Englande, the Capitaine of the newe Fortresse beganne to make a Pile, euen at the verie hauen mouth of Bulleyne: called Chatylyons Cardeyne: but the Lorde Gray Capitayne there, put away the workemen, and tooke away their tooles, and filled the Trenches, to the Frenchmens great displeasure. And after the French king caused vpon a great paine, that all the Trenches and new inuentions, should be cast downe and filled by his awne people, least he should seeme to be the breaker of the peace.

About Myghelmasse this present yere, Thomas Duke of Norffolk, and Henry Erle of Surrey his sonne and heyre, vpon certaine surmises of treason were committed to the Tower of London. And immediately after Christmasse folowyng, the king then lyyng in extremities of death, the sayde Erle was arreigned in the Guylde hall before the Lorde Maior of London, the Lorde Chaunceler of England, and diuers other Lordes and Judges, beyng there in commission. The speciall matter obiected agaynst him, was for bearyng certaine armes supposed to belong to the king, and to the prince. The bearing whereof he denyed not, but iustified the same, as of right apperteinyng vnto him, and all his auncestors Dukes of Norffolke, and by them borne tyme out of mynde, without chalenge or empechment. But yet to his inditement he pleaded not giltie. And for that he was no Lorde of the Parliament, he was enforced to be tryed by a common enquest of his countrie, which found him giltie, and thereupon he had iudgement of death, and shortly after was executed at the Tower hill.

The Duke his father came neuer to any triall, but was attainted by Parliament without aunswere, whose attainder was after vpon great consideration reuersed, in the first yere of Queene Mary. This case was to be lamented aswell for the innocencie of the olde Duke, who had bene a most valiaunt and true seruaunt to the Crowne of England, as also for his sonne, who was a Gentleman endued with great learnyng, and many excellent vertues.

The king as afore sayde nowe languishyng and lyyng in the extremes of death, made his last will and testament, wherein he not onely yelded himselfe selfe vnto almightie God, but also tooke order, that duryng the minoritie of his sonne Prince Edward, his Executors, who were to the number of. xbj. whose names shall after be shewed, that they, I say, should also be the counsaylors and ayders of the sayde Prince in all his affayres, aswell private as publike, their names were these.

Thomas Cranmer, Archebishop of Cauntorburie.
Thomas Wriothesley, Lorde Chauncelor.
Sir William Pawlet knight of the order, Lorde Saint John, and Lorde great Mayster.
Sir Edward Seymer knight of the order, Erle of Hertforde, highe Chamberleyn of England.
Sir John Russell knight of the order, Lord Priuie seale.
Sir John Dudley knight of the order, and Viscount Lisle and highe Admirall of England.
Cutbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham.
Sir Anthonie Browne knight of the order, Mayster of the horse.
Sir Edmond Mountagew knight, chief Justice of the common place.
Thomas Bromley knight, one of the Justices of the kinges Benche.
Sir Edward North knight, Chauncelor of the Augmentations.
Sir William Paget knight of the order, chiefe Secretary.
Sir Anthonie Denny knight.
Sir William Herbert knight.
Sir Edward Wootton knight, treasurer of Calice.
Nicholas Wootton, Dean of Cauntorbury, and Yorke.

So soone as the aforesaid noble king had finished his last will and testament, as aforesaide, he then yelded his spirite to almightie God, and departed this worlde the. xxbiij. day of January in the. xxxbiij. yere of his reigne, and in the yere of our Lorde. 1546. Whose corps accordyng to his will was conueied vb all funerall pompe to the College of Windsore there to be enterred.

The discription of king Henry the eight.

This Prince of all other that euer reigned ouer this realme, was most renoumed and famous, and whatsoeuer he attemped, the same had most prosperous successe, aswell in warres, as in all other matters of great importaunce, wherein he delt farre aboue all other Princes, as may appere thorowout the whole discourse of his historie. Of personage he was tall and mightie, not grosse, but in a comely proportion, in witte and memory most excellent. Of such maiestie tempered with humanity and gentlenesse, as was comely in so great and Noble a Prince. In knowlege of good letters, he farre passed all the kings of this realme that had bene before him, and for his magnificence and liberalitie, he was renoumed throughout all the worlde.

SSoone as God had called to his mercie king Henry the eight as afore=ſayde, the executors of the ſayde king with other of the nobilitie, aſſembling themſel=ues together, did firſt by ſound of Trom=pet in the Citie of London the. xxviij. day of Januarie. 1546. proclayme Prince Ed=ward, who was then at Biſhops Hatfield, king of this Realme, by the name of Ed=ward the ſixt king of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the Churches of England and Ireland in earth the ſupreme heade, he beyng then but. ix. yeres of age, and yet endued with notable vertues and great learnyng. 1546 1

Shortly after the Erle of Hertford with other of the Lordes reſorted to Hatfield afore ſayd, and from thence conducted the king with a great and right honourable companie to the Tower of London. Duryng the tyme of whoſe abode there, for the honour of his maieſtie, and ſuretie of his royall perſon, Edward Erle of Hertforde one of his Uncles on the mothers ſyde, was by order of the Counſaylors aforenamed, or the more part of them, with the aſſent of the kinges Maieſtie, not onely created Duke of Sommerſet, but alſo openly named and publiſhed Gouernor of his royall perſon, & Pro=tector of all his realmes, dominions, and ſubiectes, whoſe aduauncement was well allowed of al the noble men ſauyng of Thomas Wriothesley Erle of Southhampton, Chauncelor of England, who for his ouermuch repug=nyng to the reſt in matters of Counſaile, was not onely depriued from hys office of Chauncelor, but alſo remoued from place and authoritie in Coun=ſaile, and the cuſtodie of the great Seale of England, which onely belongeth to the Lord Chauncelor, was by order aforeſaid cõmitted to William Lord Saint John, great mayſter of the kinges houſeholde, and one of the kinges Executors as afore ſayde.

Thomas Wriothesley Erle of South=hampton.

Soone after great preparation was made for the kinges coronation, the which was performed and done at Weſtminſter, the. xix. day of Febru=arie next folowyng (beyng then Shroueſunday) with all the ſolemnitie and honour that might be, the perticulers whereof I ouerpaſſe becauſe the lyke hath bene before reherſed in this booke in other kinges tymes.

The coronation of king Edward.

The coronation beyng finiſhed, the kinges Maieſtie by the aduice of his Uncle the Protector, and other of his priuie Counſaile, myndyng firſt of all to ſeeke Gods high honour and glory, did therefore entend a reformation in religion, and did not onely ſet forth by certaine Commiſſioners or Viſi=tors ſundrie Iniunctions for the remouyng of Images out of all Churches to the ſuppreſſyng and abandoning of all Idolatrie and ſuperſtition within his realmes and dominions, but alſo certaine Homelies, or Sermons, to be diſtinctly read in the Church vnto the people, which were by his ſayde Viſi=tors accompanyed with certaine Preachers, throughout the realme for the better perswasion of the people published and put in vre. At Easter next folowyng, he set out also an order throughout all the realme, that the supper of the Lorde should be ministred to the lay people in both kindes, that is to say, both in Bread and Wine.

The communion in both kindes.

These thinges done, the sayd Lord Protector, with the rest of the counsayle, calling to minde the euill vsage and daliaunce of the Scottes concerning the matter of mariage betweene the kinges maiestie and the Ladye Mary heire of Scotlande, which as you haue before heard in the .xxxb. yere of king Henry the eyght, was concluded by parliament in Scotland, thought it not for the kinges honor to be in such maner deluded by them. Considering therefore how honorable and profitable it should be for the quyetnesse and safetie of both the realmes, that these two princes might ioyne in matrimonie did deuise sondry wayes and meanes to bringe the same to passe, and the rather for the charge which kinge Henry before his death (as it is sayd) had geuen them. But the Lordes of Scotland were so corrupted by the French king and abused by the Scottish clergy, & namely by Cardinall Beton, that they fledde from all that they had before promised. Wherefore nowe was prepared a great and puyssaunt army to passe by land into Scotlande vnder the conduction of the Lord Protector as generall, and the Erle of Warwike Lieuetenaunt of the armye. And in like maner was appoynted a nauie to passe by Sea, whereof the great Galley and .xxiij. tall shippes were well furnished with men and munitions for the warre, besides many Merchants shippes and other smaller vesselles which serued for the carryage of vittayle. And of this fleete the Lord Clynton was Admirall, and sir Thomas Woodhouse Viceadmirall.

warre with Scotland.

Now assone as the Army by lande was in a readinesse and set forward to be by a daye appoynted at Berwicke, the Lord Clinton with his nauie set also forward by Sea, and by Goddes helpe had so good passage that they arriued in safetie at Barwicke in time conuenient, and there attended vpon the armie which went by lande and passed along the sea coast in such maner as the army passed by land. So that alwayes as the army by land lacked vittayles, the shippes were at hand to vittayle them.

The armie that trauayled by land marched out of Barwicke the fourth day of September, and in good array passed forwarde into Scotlande fiue daies iourney, before they could vnderstand of any army assembled in Scotland. And in their passage they tooke and rased downe to the ground certain Castles and holdes, as Douglasse, Anderwicke, Thonetone and the towne of Hadington, which towne of Hadington, was afterward fortefied and kept with a garrison of souldiers as in the course of this history shal after appere.

In thys meane season the Scottes had assembled a puyssaunt host, esteemed to the number of thirtie thousand men, who to forstalle our armie from further inuasion into the countrie, encamped them selues vpon a streight nere to a litle riuer called Eske, foure miles on this side the Citie of Edenborough, minding there to attende our comming, because there was none other way conuenient for our armie to passe.

The Scottish armie.

The .xx. day of September both the armies came within the sight of eche other, not distaunt by estimation aboue two myles, the riuer of Fryth lyng on the East, and a hill called Faurride Bray on the West, whereon standeth standeth a litle Castle, and the Scottyſh campe northe from vs vpon the Riuer of Eske aforesayde within foure miles of Edenborough.

And at this time our men were in no readinesse to fight, nor did not then think they should haue battaile. Insomuch that the Duke of Somerset lord Protector, standing and viewing the Scottes how they aduaunced themselues towardes battayle, sayde vnto the Erle of Warwicke who then was with him, that for his life the Scottes ment nothing lesse then to fight at that time.

But here I thinke it not amysse before I go any further to the declaration of the fortune of this battayle beyng at hande, something to digresse and shew what the Lorde Protector had done a litle before this vnprouided battayle, and I do the rather note it, for that I am perswaded that by reason thereof, the successe was the more prosperous.

Ye haue hearde a litle before the setting forward of this warre, how to auoyde bloudshed and to draw the inconstant nation of the Scottes to conformitie and vnitie, especially in a matter to none more profitable and beneficiall then to themselues, which was to haue aduaunced and set forth that mariage, that they themselues had by the consent of their whole parliament agreed vnto. And for the confirmation of the same had geuen forth to king Henry the eyght the great Seale of Scotland, as before ye haue heard. The kinges maiestie by the aduice of the Lorde Protector and other of the priuy counsayle had had with them many and sundry conferences, and had sent vnto them many and sundry Ambassadors, and vsed all the meanes that was possible to haue reduced them to the performaunce of their promise, rather then to hasard their countrie vpon a conquest. And now seyng no trauayle could preuaile, they were inforced to suffer the two deuouring serpentes of the earthe, that is the swoorde and fire to be let lose and to vse their accustomed rage and fury, with consumption of richesse, libertie and life. The discreete Protector thought yet as the last refuge and meane to attayne peace not onely himselfe, but also to moue all other by prayer to call vpon the ayde and mercy of almightie God, that it might please his deuine maiestie to mollifie the hard heartes of the Scottes for the better auoyding of the shedyng of innocent and Christian bloud. And for this purpose he caused a speciall prayer to be made, which beyng imprinted was published and commaunded wyth all reuerend deuotion to be sayde in all the Churches of England.

But now to returne againe to the battaile, ye heard that the Armies on both sydes approched so nere, that the one was in the others sight: ye heard also that the Lorde Protector was of opinion, that it was not ment of the Scottes to fight at that tyme, but onely that they made a shewe of themselues, which he termed to be but a Scottishe bragge, howbeit it proued farre otherwise. For sodainly the Scottes beyng encamped in a baley by the riuer of Eske, arose and made great hast vp the hill, mindyng to haue obteyned the hill, the wind, and the sonne, which if they had gotten, then our men had bene much hindred, the which thing the Englishmen perceyued, who as then were not in good array, neither could their armie of footemen come so soone to the recouerie of the hill as they would. Wherefore to stop the Scottes of their purpose, the Lorde Gray beyng Capitain of the horsemen, was forced (partly out of order) to set forward, and to geue the onset vpon the Scottes, onely to stay them from the hill. The which English horsemen nobly and valiauntly encountered with the Scottes footemen, but the Scottes stoode so close, and were so defended with their Pykes, that our men coulde not enter. By reason whereof diuers of the Englishe Gentlemen that gaue the onset were ouerthrowne and slaine, the which when they that folowed perceyued, they reculed, and in runnyng backe, ranne through a peece of the English armie of footemen (which by this tyme had recouered the hill, and were behinde the Englishe horsemen) and hurt many of them, howbeit the footemen brake not their array, but stood still in good order in the face of the Scottes. The Scottes perceuing the English footemen to haue recouered the hill, and seyng the whole armie readie to geue them the onset, and the vawarde marchyng towardes them, sodainly (of what occasion no man certainly can tell) they forsakyng their weapons, and their former places fled, the which when our men perceyued, they with a great shoute cryed they flie, they flie, & therewithall they fled in dede spedily, and our men pursued after in chase as fast, namely our horsemen, and folowed so egerly and with such fiercenesse, that they ouertooke many and spared in dede but fewe. And the chase continued almost the length of fiue myles, and al the way was couered with dead men, Pikes, Jackes, Skulles, Swords, Bucklers, Daggers, & other weapons, and the riuer made red with bloud. And at this battail called Muskleborough field, nere vnto a place called Pinkerslough, there were slaine, as some of the Scottes themselues confessed. xiiij. thousand Scottes, among the which number as it was well knowne by credible report, there were slaine of noble men, Lordes, Lardes, and Gentlemen. xxvj. hundred and aboue, and there were taken prisoners of the Scottes. xv. hundred, whereof many were Gentlemen. And among other the Erle of Huntley was one, who was taken by sir Raufe Auane. And within lesse then two yeres folowyng, he made his escape, and gat again into Scotland. And of the Englishmen there were slaine not aboue one hundred persons.

After this battaile finished, with victorie to the great honor of the Lord Protector, the Erle of Warwike, and other the noble & valiaunt Capitaynes there present, and to the high honor of the kings Maiestie, and the realme of England, the sayde Lorde Protector, considering of vertue and well doyng, the proper mede and due reward to be honour, aswell therefore for reward to them that had before done well, as also to encourage other hereafter to do the lyke, did adourne many Lordes, Knightes and Gentlemen, with dignities as foloweth.

Sir William Woodhouse knight his Viceadmirall.

There were in the armie of great ordinaunce. xb. peeces, and of carriages. ix. hundred Carres, beside many Wagons, whereof the Commissarye generall was George Ferrers.

The next day after this battaile, the Lorde Protector with the armye marched forward to the towne of Lithe, where they remayned. x. or. xii. dayes, and there began to make Trenches and fortifications: But because Winter approched, & the season of the yere serued not, it was thought good in tyme to returne home to the Borders. And in their returnyng, first they tooke a Castell called Lowthale, and placed for Captaine thereof sir Hugh Willoughby. And from thence they marched to the Castell of Hames, where was shewed some face of resistance, but when the Englishmen had planted their ordinaunce and artillary, they yelded, and there was placed Captaine Edward Dudley esquier, sonne and heyre to the Baron Dudley. And from thence they passed to the Castell of Rokesborough, which beyng a place very meete to kepe frontire warre, the same beyng yelded, was forthwith by the Englishmen fortified, & there was made Captain, sir Raufe Bulmer, and so he returned vnto Barwicke, and thether came vnto him, these Lordes and Gentlemen of Scotland, and submitted themselues vnto the king of Englandes obedience and tooke their othe, whose names folow.

¶ Lard in Scotland, is a degree next vnder a knight, which we call an Esquier, or such a one as is Lord of a towne.

After that the Lord Protector had done all the thinges before expressed, he then departed from Berwicke to Newcastell, and there calling to remembraunce the worthy seruice done by certayne other gentlemen who before at the makyng of knightes had withdrawen themselues from the preferment of honor, and yet were right worthy thereof, did therefore direct his letters with authoritie to the Erle of Warwicke, then remaynyng at Barwicke for the commyng of the Scottish Commissioners, to adorne and aduance to the order of knighthoode these persones following, which was done accordingly, whose names were these sir Andrew Corbet a right graue and valiaunt Gentleman, a carefull Captaine ouer his souldiors, and verie faithfull in his peece, and also a stoute and worthie Archer, sir Arthur Mainwaring wyng a politique Capitayn, sir Thomas Nevell the Lord Nevels brother. Sir Anthony Strelly, and sir Richard Verney.

During the time that the Lord Protector was occupied with the Scots as aforesayd, the Lordes of the counsaile that remayned in Englande, with great helpe of Thomas Cranmer Archebishop of Cantorburye, and other of the Clergy of the realme, greatly furthered and aduaunced religion, and namely the bookes of Homelyes and Paraphrase of Erasmus, the which Stephyn Gardiner Bishop of Winchester and other were muche offended as ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

But to retourne, when the Lorde Protector had put all thinges in order in Scotland as aforesayd, and had fortefied the fortes and Castelles vpon the borders, he returned into Englande, and the Citizens of London hering of his comming determined to receyue him, and conueigh him thorough the Citie with much ioy and triumph. But he hauing knowlege thereof was offended therewith, and forbade any such tryumph to be made for him, for sayd he if any thing hath bene done to the honor of the realme, it was gods doing, and willed them to giue him the prayse.

Soone after the comming home of the Lorde Protector, the kinges maiestie called his high court of parliament, and held the same at Westminster the foure and twentie day of November in the first yere of his reigne, and there continued the same vntill the foure and twentie day of December next following. And in this parliament among other things, there was geuen vnto the kinges maiestie all Colleges, Chauntryes and Free Chappels to be bestowed and vsed at his pleasure. And also in the same parliament was repealed the estatute of six articles made in the time of king Henry the eyght, and diuerse other tending to that effect.

A parliament at Westminster.

And in the ende of this yere dyed Fraunces the French king, for whome a solempne obsequy was kept in Paules in London, and Henrye his sonne succeded him in that kingdome.

Fraunces the French king dead.

And here once againe to remember the affayres of Scotland, the king and hys counsayle considering the sturdye of the same did not onely consist in making of good defence vpon the borders, did therefore deuise for the subiection of the inner part of that lande to haue some speciall forte or place for the better pacifying and keping quyet of that countrye. And in conclusion they thought it meete to fortefie the towne of Haddington, to the which with all speede was sent a garrison to defend the same.

A litle before Ester next following, the king by his Lieger in Fraunce was credibly certefied that the French king made great prouision to go into Scotland, for the remouing of the English garrison that kept the towne of Haddington as after ye shall heere.

The king heering these newes, caused new musters to be made, and a new armye to be rayed, to be sent into Scotlande for the defence of Haddington. And for this prouision there were first certaine letters sent from the kings maiestie vnto certaine Citezens of London, who before had bene ceassed at a certaine valure of goodes. And in the superscription of the sayde letters, the king named euery one to whome he wrote Esquier, requiring them to haue in a readynesse by a day appoynted certayne Demylaunces, and certaine light horsemen, with all the furniture that to them belonged.

And this yere the watch in London, which had not beene vsed nintene yeres before was againe kept by sir John Gresham then Maior of London, both on the euen of saint John Baptist, and also on the euen of saint Peter next following, as brauely and freshly as it had bene at any time set out before. And the same was much beutefied with the company of horsemen aboue mencioned.

Mydsomer watche.

Soone after this, the king was certefied that Mounsire de Essy Lieutenaunt to the French king, and Peter Strozy and Mounsire Mandelot and a Dutch Capitaine called the Ringraue, with ten thousand men were arryued in Scotland, and had beseged the towne of Haddington: wherfore in all hast possible the king set forwarde his armye. But before the army could come, there went from Berwiche vnder the guyding of syr Robert Bowes and syr Thomas Palmer knightes. viij. hundred horsemen, where of were seuen hundred men of armes, and Demilaunces. The Frenchmen hauing knowlege of their comming, layde a bushement for them, and the most part of them were either taken or slayne, namely syr Robert Bowes and syr Thomas Palmer were taken prisoners, howbeit for all this ouerthrowe, our Englishmen manfully and valiauntly defended the towne of Haddington and often skirmished with the Frenchmen, and put them to the worsse. The siege of this towne of Haddington by the Frenche men was long, fierce and terrible, and the batterie was so great that no parte of the walles of the towne were left vnbeaten downe. Notwithstanding by the manly and valiaunt courage of the Englishmen, and namely of syr James Wilford who was Capitaine of that towne, whatsoeuer was in the day beaten downe by the Frenchmen, the same was again fortefied in the night by the Englishmen, although the slaughter of our men there was so great, that they filled vp their ditches, and made their rampiers with the dead English carcasses. And this siege continued from the .xxviij. day of June vnto the twentie day of August next following, and then came thether the Erle of Shrewesbury with the army afore mencioned, which were to the number of fiftene thousand, of the which there were fiue thousand Almaines, whose Capitaine was named Cortpennie.

The Frenchmen and Scottes knowyng of the commyng of the Englishe armie, departed with speede from the siege of the sayd towne of Haddyngton, much commendyng and praysyng the English Capitaynes and soldiors, and specially one Capitaine of the Frenchmen, at his departure, came to the towne of Haddyngton, desiryng audience and sayde, God prosper you ye are good soldiors, the honour is yours, and the shame is ours, the which prayse of enemyes beyng voyde of all partialitie and affection, is commonly most true. So that after the Erle had well victayled the towne, and furnished the same with fresh and lustie souldiors, he then departed into England. After whose departure, the Englishemen kept the sayde towne valiauntly, both agaynst the Scottes and Frenchmen, and helde the same vntill the. xx. day of September, in the thirde yere of the reigne of this king Edward. Haddington raced and destroied by the Englishmen.

After the returne of the souldiors from Haddyngton, there happened in London a great mortalitie by pestilence, and diuers were buryed in the morning before day, and late in the euening, and that in very close maner. Wherfore a commaundement from the king was directed to the Churchwardens, and Curates of euery Parishe in London, prohibityng that no corps should be buryed before sixe of the clocke in the mornyng, nor after sixe at night. And that there should be at the burityng of euery corps, one Bell rong by the space of three quarters of an houre at the least.

The kinges Maiestie shortly after this, sommoned his high Court of Parliament to be holden at Westminster vpon prorogation the fourth daye of November, in the second yere of his reigne, and there continued the same vnto the, xiiij. day of March next folowyng, which was in the thirde yere of his reigne. And in this Parliament the vse of the Masse was cleene forbidden, and a booke made for the vniformitie of diuine seruice, and the administration of the Sacramẽts in the English tongue, was published & set forth.

A parliament.

And in this Parliament also was attainted sir Thomas Seymer, called Baron Seymer of Sudley, brother to the Lorde Protector, high Admirall of England. The causes and articles obiected against him, are expressed in the booke of statutes. And the .xx. day of March next folowyng, which was in the thirde yere of the king, he was beheaded at the Tower hill, and then it was commonly talked, that the fall of the one brother, would be the ouerthrow of the other, as soone after it came to passe.

Sir Thomas Seimour attainted and executed.

After the ende of this Parliament, and at the ende of the next terme, the Lorde Protectors grace, and the rest of the kinges priuie and learned counsaile being present in the starre Chamber, called before them all the Justices of peace, and knightes of the shire, where the Lorde Riche beyng then Lorde Chauncelor, made vnto them this Oration folowyng.

An exhortacion or rather an admonitiõ geuen to the Justices of Peace.

It hath bene vsed and accustomed before this tyme, to call at certaine tymes the Justices of peace before the kinges Maiesties counsaile, to geue vnto them admonition and warnyng, diligently as is their duetie, to looke to the obseruyng of such thinges as are committed to their charge, accordyng to the trust which the kinges Maieslie hath in them. Notwithstanding at this tyme we call you not before vs of custome, but rather of necessitie: for beryng dayly and perceiuyng as we do, the great negligence and little hede which is taken and geuen to the obseruation of the good and wholesome lawes and orders in this realme, wherupon much disorder doth daily ensue, and the kings Maiesties Proclamations, and orders taken by the Counsaile (as we are aduertised) not executed, the people brought to a disobedience, and in a maner all his Maiesties studie and ours in settyng a good and most godly stay to the honour of God, and the quiet of the realme, spent in vaine, and come to nothyng. The which as we haue great hope and trust not to be altogether so, yet so much as it is, and so much as it lacketh in keepyng the realme in a Godly order and stay, we must nedes impute and lay the fault therof in you which are the Justices of peace in euery shire. To whome we are wont to direct our writynges, and to whose trust and charge the kings Maiestie hath committed the execution of all his Proclamations, of his actes of Parliament, and of his lawes.

We are informed that many of you are so negligent, and so slack, in that that it doth appere that you do rather looke as it were through your fingers then diligently see to the execution of the sayd lawes and proclamations. For if you would accordyng to your dutyes, to your othe, to the trust which the kinges Maiestie hath in you, geue your diligence and care toward the execution of the same most Godly statutes, and Iniunctions, there should no disobedience, no disorder, nor euill rule be begon, or aryse in any part of the realme, but it should by and by be repressed, kept downe, and reformed. But it is feared that the thyng it selfe geueth occasion therevnto, that diuers of you do not onely set forth, but rather hinder, so much as lyeth in you, the kinges Maiesties procedynges, and are content that there should aryse some disobedience, and that men should repine against Godly orders set forth by hys Maiestie, you do so slackly loke to the execution of the same: So that in some shires which be farther of, it may appere that the people haue neuer heard of diuers of his Maiesties Proclamations, or if they haue heard, that you are content to winke at it, and to neglect it, so that it is all one as though it were neuer commaunded. But if you do well consider and remember your duties, first to almightie God, and then to the kinges Maiestie, the welth of the whole realme, the safegarde and suretie of your awne selues: you must nedes see, that except such orders as the kinges Maiestie hath set, and hereafter shall appoynt to be kept: Neyther the Realme can be defended, if the enemye shoulde inuade, nor in peace it can not stande, but vpon the contempt of good and wholesome lawes, all disorder and inconueniences should come: The people shoulde be wylde and sauage, and no man sure of hys awne. And if at anye tyme there was occasion, and cause to bee circumspect and diligent aboute the same, there was neuer more tyme then nowe. How we stand in Scotlande ye knowe, and that other forreine power maketh great preparation to ayde them, and in deede doth come to their ayde, whereof we are surely informed and certified. Wherfore if there should not be good order and obedience kept in the realme, the realme were like vtterly to be destroied. Neuer forreine power could yet hurt, or in any part preuaile in this realme, but by disobedience and misorder within our selues. That is the way in the which god will plague vs, if he mind to punish vs. And so long as we do agree among our selues, and be obedient vnto our Prince & to his godly orders & lawes, we may be sure ẏ god is with vs & that forayn power shall not preuayle against vs nor hurt vs: wherfore once againe and still we must and do lay this charge vpon you that are the best of the shire and Iustices of the peace, that with so conuenient speede as you can, that you do repayre downe into your cõtries, & you shal geue warning to the Gentlemen of the shire that haue no necessary businesse here, ẏ they repayre downe e the man to his country, and there both you and they, who be reconed the stay of euery shire, to see good order and good rule kept. Prouide that your Sessions of Gaole deliuery and quarter Sessions be well kept, and there in your meetinges to be such that Iustice may be well and truly ministred, the offendors doꝛs and malefactoꝛs punished accoꝛding to the lawes of the realme without any feare of any man, rather then foꝛ fauoꝛ ye shall suffer those to escape which with their euill example might bꝛing other to the lyke mishap. And that all Vagabons, all lewde & light taletellers & sedicious bearers of false newes of the kinges Maiestie oꝛ of his counsaile, oꝛ such as will pꝛeache without licence, be immediatly by you repꝛest and punished. And if there should chaunce any light oꝛ lewde felowes to make any rowtes oꝛ ryots oꝛ vnlawfull assemblies, any sedicious meetinges, vpꝛoꝛes oꝛ vpꝛysynges in any place, by the sedicious and diuelish mocion of some pꝛiuie Traytoꝛs, that you and they appease them at the first, and appꝛehende the first auctheꝛs and causers thereof, and certefie vs wyth speede. The lightnesse of the rude and ignoꝛant people must be repꝛest and oꝛdered by your gꝛauitie and wisdome. And here you may not (if any such thing chaunce) dissemble with those such lewde men, and hyde your selues, foꝛ it shall be required of you if such misoꝛder be, and surely without your ayde and helpe, oꝛ your dissemblyng, such mysoꝛder cannot be. Noꝛ we do not say that we feare any such thing likely to chaunce: But we geue you warning befoꝛe, least it shoulde chaunce, we haue to much experience in this realme what inconuenience commeth of such matters. And though some light persones in their rage do not consyder it, yet we doubt not but you way it and know it well enough. And if it should chaunce our enimies (who is mayntayned by other foꝛreine power and the Bishop of Rome) sodainly to arriue in some places of England, either dꝛiuen by tempest, oꝛ of purpose to do hurt, ye ought to se such oꝛders kept by fiering of their Beacons, as hath alredy bene wꝛitten vnto you by our letters, to repulse the same in so good array as you can, as we do not doubt but ye will foꝛ the safegard of your countrie, so that the enemie shall haue litle toye of his comming. And foꝛ that purpose ye shall see diligently that men haue hoꝛse, harnesse, and other furniture of weapon ready, accoꝛding to the statutes and good oꝛders of the realme and the kinges maiesties commaundements, and so foꝛ this time ye may depart.

Here is to be noted, that accoꝛdyng to the olde adage, Man purposeth but God disposeth. The cause that the foꝛmer and earnest admonicion was made, specially at this tyme, was onely foꝛ feare of the landyng of foꝛreyne powers within this realme. Foꝛ true it is, that the kinges maiestie by the aduice of the Loꝛde Pꝛotectoꝛ and other of his Counsaile minded this yere the conquest of Scotland, and foꝛ the same had made great pꝛouision aswell beyond the sea in Germanie, from whence he had fiue thousande Launceknightes, whose Capitaine was Coꝛtpeny, of whome mencion is made beꝛoꝛe at the rasyng and defasyng of the towne of Haddyngton in Scotland: Besyde these also were made other great pꝛouisions within the realme. And the Scottes at this tyme beyng in great feare of England, made such suite to the Pope, and the French king, that they graunted them great ayde, and the French king was with his power in a great readinesse. But beholde the wonderfull woꝛke of God: That which was feared and of vs purposed, came not to passe, and that which was least feared, & litle oꝛ nothing thought vpon, sodainly happened, to the great daunger of the destruction of the whole realme of Englande (if almightie God had not holpen vs with the mightye arme of his defence) which chaunced by intestine and ciuil warre among our selues, selues, as after ye shall here. By reason whereof those straungers which before were prepared at the kinges Maiesties great costes and charges for the conquest of Scotland, were employed as necessary men to suppresse the rebellion of our awne nation, and to saue England from destruction, such are the workes of the Lorde against mans policie.

The kinges Maiestie as aforesayd purposing the inuasion of Scotland, made nowe great prouision for the same. But in this as he did euer before, he vsed all gentle meanes and policies to winne them without sheddyng of bloud, if it were possible: wherefore he nowe wrote vnto them a solempne Epistle exhortatory, to moue them to the consideration of themselues, and the state of their Countrie. The Copie of which Exhortation foloweth word for word as is was written, and the title thereof was this.

¶ Edward by the grace of God Duke of Sommerset, Erle of Hertford, Uiscount Beauchampe, Lorde Seymer, Uncle to the kings highnesse of England, Gouernor of his most royall person, and Protector of all his realmes, dominions, and subiectes, Lieutenaunt generall of all his Maiesties Armies, both by lande and sea, Treasurer and Erle Marshall of England, gouernor of the Iles of Gerneley, and Jersey, and knight of the most noble order of the Garter, with others of the counsaile of the sayd most high and noble Prince Edward, by the grace of God, of England, Fraunce, and Ireland king, defender of the fayth, and in earth vnder Christ, the supreme head of the Churches of England and Ireland. To the Nobilitie and Counsaylors, Gentlemen, and the Commons, and all other the inhabitauntes of the realme of Scotland, greetyng and peace.

An Epistle exhortatory sent to the Scottes.

Considering with our selues the present state of things, and weiyng more deepely the maner and termes wherein you and we doe stand. It maketh vs to maruaile what euill and fatall chaunce doth so disseuer your heartes, and maketh them so blinde and vnmindefull of your profite, and to still conciliate and heape to your selues most extreme mischefes. The which we whom ye will nedes haue your enemyes, go about to take away from you, and perpetually to ease you thereof. And also by all reason and order of necessitie, it should be rather more conuenient for you to seeke and require moderate agrementes of vs, whome God hath hetherto according to our most iust, true and Godly meanynges and ententes, prospered and set forwarde with your affliction and miserie: Then that we beyng superiors in the field, Maisters of a great part of your realme, should seeke vpon you. Yet to the entent that our charitable myndes and brotherly loue should not ceasse by all meanes possible to prouoke and call you to your awne commoditie and profite. Euen as the father to the sonne, or the elder brother to the yonger brother: And as the louyng Philitian would do to the mistrustfull and ignozant pacient: We are content to call and crie vpon you, to looke on your state, to auoyd the great calamitie that your countrie is in, to haue vs rather brothers then enemies, and rather Countrimen, then Conquerors. And if your Gouernor or Capitaynes shall retayne and kepe from you this our exhortation as heretofore they haue done our Proclamation, tendyng to the lyke effect for their awne priuate welth and commoditie, not regardyng though you be still in miserye, so they haue profite and gouernaunce ouer you, and shall still

abuſe you with feyned and forged tales: Yet this ſhall bee a witneſſe afore God and all Chriſten people, betwixt you and vs: that we profeſſyng the Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt, accordyng to the doctrine thereof, do not ceaſſe to call and prouoke you, from the effuſion of your awne bloud, from the deſtruction of the realme of Scotlande, from perpetuall enmitie and hatred, from the finall deſtruction of your nation, and from ſeruitude to forreyn nations: to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your writers hath alwayes wiſhed might once come to paſſe. Who that hath read the ſtories in tymes paſt, and doth marke and note the great Battayles fought betwene England and Scotland, the incurſions, rodes, and ſpoyles, which hath bene done on both the parties. The realme of Scotland fiue times wonne by one king of England. The Scottiſhe kings ſonnes taken priſoners, ſome ſlaine in battaile, ſome for very ſorow and diſcomfort vpon loſſe, dying and departyng the worlde: and ſhall perceyue agayne that of all nations in the world, that nation onely beſyde England, ſpeaketh the ſame language, and as you and we be annexed & ioyned in one Iſland: ſo no people are ſo like in maner, forme, language, and all conditions as we are. Shall not he thinke it a thing very vnmete, vnnaturall, and vnchriſtian, that there ſhould be betwixt vs ſo mortall warre, who in reſpect of all other nations be and ſhould be like as two brethren of one Iſlande of great Britteyne? And though he were a ſtraunger to both, what would he thinke more meete then if it were poſſible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, & to be deuided in rulers which is al one in Countrey. And forſomuch as two ſucceſſors cannot concur and fall into one, by no other maner of meanes then by mariage, whereby one bloud, one lignage, and parentage is made of two, and an indefeſible right geuen of both to one, without the deſtruction and abholiſhing of eyther. If God ſhould graunt that whatſoeuer you would wiſhe other then that which nowe not by fortune hath chaunced, but by his infinite mercy, and moſt inſcrutable prouidence, as careful for you he hath geuen vnto you. The which thing that you ſhould alſo thinke to come of his diſpoſition, and not by blinde fortune, how vnlikely hath it bene, and howe ſodainly hath it turned, that the power of God might be ſhewed.

Your laſt king beyng a prince of much excellency and yong, whom you know after a promiſe broken contrary to his honor, and miſfortune by Gods iuſt iudgement following vpon it, God eyther by ſorrow or by ſome meanes otherwiſe at his inſcrutable pleaſure, did take away from you, had three children: Did not almightie God as it were to ſhew his will and pleaſure to be, that the long continued warre and enemitie of both the nations ſhoulde be taken away, and knit in perpetuall loue and amitie, take the two men children of thoſe babies beyng diſtant the one from the other, & in diuerſe places both as it were at one time, and within the ſpace of foure and twenty houres leauing but one mayden chylde and prince. A matter worthy to be noted.

When the moſt wiſe and victorious Prince late our king and Maiſter king Henry the eyght in other of his mariages not moſt fortunate, had by his moſt lawfull and moſt vertuous wife Quene Jane, his other two wifes before that mariage departed this worlde, and neuer ſurmiſe nor queſtion made of that mariage ſith that time to this daye, nor ſo much as all her life time, name or motion to or of any other wife, one Prince of ſo high expectation, of so great gyftes of God, the right and vndoubted heyre of the realme of England and his maiestie onely of male issue left behinde him to succede the imperiall crowne. If nothing else had bene done, what can any wise or any Christian man that thinketh the worlde to be gouerned by Gods prouidence and not by fortune, thinke otherwise but that it was Gods pleasure it should be so that these two realmes should ioyne in mariage, and by a godly Sacrament make a godly, perpetuall, and most friendly vnitie, and concorde, whereby such benefites as of vnitie and concorde commeth, maye through his infinite grace come vnto these realmes. Or if any man of you or of any other nation doubteth hereof (except you looke for miracles) to be done herein, and yet if ye marke all the possibilities of the natures of the two Princes, the children already had, the doubtfull chaunce least eche of them should haue a sonne, or both daughters, or not of meete ages, with other circumstances both of the partie of this realme of Englande and that of Scotland, which hath not chaunced in eyght hundred yeres, it must nedes be reconed a great meruell and a miracle. But let it be no miracle seyng that God doth not now speake in Oracles, as a mongest the Iewes he did: And present propheties now a dayes be but eyther not certayne or else not playne: what more certayntie can bee had of Gods will in this case then the before rehersed doth bringe: But if God himselfe should speake: what could he speake more, then he speaketh in these? Call you them prouidences or chaunces, yf you be still afflicted and punished, may he not say, I of mine infinite mercy and loue to your nation had prouided a right heyre and a prince to the one, and a right heyre and Princes to the other to be ioyned in my holy lawes, and by the law of nature and the worlde to haue made, and vnitie concorde and peace, in the which Isle of both the realmes, you refused it, you loued better dissention then vnitie, discorde then agrement, warre then peace, hatred then loue and charitie. If you do then therefore smart for it, whome can you blame, but your owne election? But because some of those who maketh hereunto impedimentes, cannot but confesse that there appereth Gods prouidence herein, and opportunitie and occasion geuen to vnitie of both the realmes: yet may hereafter say, and heretofore haue sayde, that the fault herein is, that we seeke not equalitie nor the mariage, but a conquest, we would not be friends but be Lordes. Although our proclamations at the last warres doth enough declare the contrary, yet here we protest and declare vnto you and al Christian people to be the kinges maiesties minde our Maisters by our aduise and counsayle not to conquere, but to haue in amitie, not to wyn by force but to conciliate by loue, not to spoyle and kill, but to saue and kepe, not to dissever and deuorce, but to ioyne in maryage from high to lowe both the realmes, to make of one Isle one realme in loue, amitie, concorde, peace and charitie. Which if you refuse and driue vs to conquere, who is guiltie of the bloudshed? who is the occasion of the warre? who maketh the battayles, the brenning of houses, and the denastation which shall folow? Can it be denyed but that we haue the great seale of Scotland graunted by the parliament of Scotland for the mariage which should be made with assurances and pledges vntill the performances. And this in the time that the late king of most famous memory our souereigne Lorde king Henry the eyght did reigne, and in the time of the same your Gouernor, who now is the Erle of Arreigne,

Arreigne, who then beyng a chiefe doer and laborer therein for the high and inestimable benefite of that realme. So sone as he was by the late Cardinal of saint Andrewes and others, with certayne vaine feares and hopes and greedinesse of dignitie peruerted, reuolted from hys first agreement, and put all the realme to the losse of such holdes and fortresses as are now taken from you, and to the losse of a foughten fielde, for the which we are sory if otherwise peace might haue bene concluded, for his owne priuate lucre and recheleshesse of that noble realme. And what ende can you looke for of these maner of procedinges, but such successe as heretofore hath bene experimented and assayed? we offer loue, we offer equalitie and amitie, we ouercome in warre and offer peace, we winne holdes and offer no conquest, we get in your land, and offer England. What can be more offered and more proffered, then entrecourse of marchandises, and enterchaunge of mariages, the abholishing of al such our lawes as prohibiteth the same, or might be impediment to the mutuall amitie. We haue offered not onely to leaue the authoritie, name, tytle, right, or chalenge, of Conquerour, but to receyue that which is the shame of men ouer conned, to leaue the name of the nation, and the glory of any victorie (if any we haue had, or should haue of you) and to take the indifferent olde name of Britaynes againe, because nothing should be left on our part vnoffered, nothing on your part vnrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. And all the worlde might testifie, all other meanes not beyng able to do any thing, after many other wayes and remedyes attempted, battaile of vs to be taken as an extreeme refuge, to attaine right and reason amongest Christian men. If any man may rightfully make battaile for his espouse and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great Seale of Scotland promised to the sonne and heyre of England? If it be lawfull by Gods lawe to fight in a good quarrell, and for to make peace: This is to make an ende of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace, which to confirme we shall fight, and you to breake, is it not easie to discerne who hath the better part? God and the sword hath alreadie and shall hereafter if there be no remedie trie it. Who so willeth ꝑ mariage to go forward: Who so mindeth the peace and tranquilitie of both the realmes: who willeth no conquest to be had, but amitie and loue to go forwarde, we refuse no man: Let him bring his name, and his pledge of good seruice in this quarrell, he shall not onely be receyued to the amitie, but shall haue sufficient defence agaynst the aduersaries, and recompence of his liuyng if he sustain any losse. We neither do nor entend to put any man from his landes, tackes, or offices: Onlesse he will needes resist, and so compell vs therevnto. What face hath this of conquest? we entend not to disenherite your Queene, but to make her heires inheritors also to England. What greater honour can you seeke vnto your Queene then the mariage offered? what more meeter mariage then this with the kinges highnesse of England? What more sure defence in the nonage of your Queene for the realme of Scotland, then to haue England your patrone and Guarrison? we seeke not to take from you your lawes, nor customes: but we seeke to redresse your oppressions, which of diuers ye doe sustaine. In the realme of England diuers lawes and customes be according to the auncient vsage thereof. And likewise Fraunce, Normandie, and Gascoygne hath sundrie kinde of orders. Hath all the realmes and dominimariage to be had betweene Mary the heire of Scotland and Prince Edward heir of England.

Britain was the first name of England and Scotslande.

ons that the Emperor now hath one custome, and one sort of lawes? These vaine feares and fantasies of expulsion of your nation, of chaunging the lawes, of making a conquest, be driuen into your heades, of those who in dede had rather you were all conquered, spoyled, and slaine, then they would lose any poynt of their will, of their desyre of rule, of their estimation, which they knowe in quietnesse would be seene what it were, as it were in a calme water. Nowe in this tumult of discorde, when the realme is tossed vp and downe with waues and scourges of battaile, famine, and other mischiefes which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be espyed. But looke on them you that haue witte and prudence, & consider the state of your Queene, and realme. You will not keepe her sole and vnmaryed, the which were to you great dishonour. If you marry her within the realme, that cannot extinguishe the title which we haue to the Crowne of Scotland. And what dissention, enuy, grudge, and malice that shall brede among you is easie to perceyue. You will marry her out of the realme, our title remayneth, you be subiectes to a forreyn Prince of another Countrie, and of another language: And vs ye haue your enemies euen at your elbowe, your succours farre of from you. And be we not in the bowelles nowe of the realme? haue we not a great part therof either in subiection or in amitie and loue? who shall come into your realme but he shall be met with, and fought with, if neede be euen of your owne nation, who be faythfull and true to the realme of England in the way of this most Godly vnion by maryage. And if any forreyn power, Prince, or Potentate, or whosoeuer be your ayder to nourishe still discorde, sende you an armie also: How shall they oppresse you, fill your houses, waste your groundes, spende and consume your victaile, holde you in subiection, and regarde you as slaues which without them coulde not liue, and will take your Queene to bestowe as they lust, and specially if their ruler or king (as perchaunce he may be) in other warres be otherwise occupyed, to be a pray to vs, and a true conquest. Then it shall be to late to say, we will haue a maryage, and no conquest: we wilshe peace and amitie: we are wery of battaile and miserie. The stubburne ouercommed must suffer the victors pleasure, and partinacite will make the victorie more insolent, whereof you your selfe haue geuen the cause. If they send money and Capitaynes, but no souldiers: First if they be Capitaines, who ruleth, and who doth obey? who shall haue the honour of the enterprice and if it be well atchieued: But whether it be well atchieued or no, which number is that which shall bee slaine? whose bloud shall be shed? their money peraduenture shall be consumed, and their commaundementes obeyed: But whose bodies shall smart for it? whose landes shall bee wasted? whose houses burned? what realme made desolate? Remember what it is to haue a forrein power within you? a strong power of your enemyes vpon you, you as it were the Campe and plaine betwixt them to fight on, and to be troden vpon both of the victor and the ouercommed. And imagine you see before your eyes your wyues, and daughters in daunger of the wantonnesse and insolencie of the Souldiours: The prowde lookes of the Capitaynes, and Souldiors whome you call to helpe you: the contempt you shall bring your nation in: And then take heede least in deede that folowe which you feare, that is, that you shall be by them conquered: that ye shall be by them put from your holdes, landes, tackes, and offices:

offices: That your lawes by them shall be altered: that your nation shall by them be destroyed. Consider in this realme: did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out? Where be ỳ Pictes, once a great nation betwixt you & vs? how did the nation of Fraunce put out the Galles out of all Fraunce? how got the Turke first all Grecia, & now a late all Hungary, but beyng called in for to ayd and helpe. And did not the Gothes by like meanes get all Italy, and the Lombards one part thereof now called Lombardie? what loke you for more? Medie souldiors, & hauyng their weapons in their handes, and knowyng that you cannot liue without them, what will they not commaund you to do? what will they not encroche vpon you? what will they not thinke they may do? and what wil they thinke that you dare do? This forreyn helpe is your confusion, that succor is your detriment, the victorie so had is your seruitude. What is then to be thought of losse taken with them? the straungers & forrein souldiors shal oppresse you within: our power and strength without: and of your owne nation, so many as loue quietnesse, godlinesse, & the welth of your realme, shall help also to skourge & afflict you. Is it not better to compose and acquite all this calamitie & trouble by mariage: To end al sorowes and battailes by such and so honorable a peace? Hath the Emperor Spain & Burgondie not by title of mariage? How holdeth the French king Britein now lately annexed to that crowne, but by title of mariage? How hath all the great princes of the world happily & with quiet made of two kingdomes one, of diuers Lordshippes one: Of nations alwayes at warre with themselues, or else in doubtfull peace, one well gouerned kingdome, rule, and dominion, but by that most Godly, most quiet, & most amiable composition of mariage? Two meanes there is of makyng one rule whereto title is pretended, and perfect agreement betwixt two nations: Eyther by force and superioritie, which is conquest, or by equality and loue, which is by parentage and maryage. Ye hate the one, that is conquest: and by refusing the other, you enforce vpon you hatred & malice. You wil not haue peace: you will not haue alliaunce: you wyll not haue concorde, and conquest commeth vpon you, whether ye will or no. And yet if all things were considered, we feare it wyll appeare, that it were better for you to bee conquered of vs, then succoured of straungers, lesse losse to your goodes, lesse hurt to your landes, lesse dishonour to your realme. This nation which is one in tongue, one in Countrey and birth, hauyng so little diuersitie to occupie the whole, then other powers to come into you, neyther like in language, ne yet like in behauiour, who should rule ouer you, and take you to bee but their slaues. But we excuses and finally declare and protest vnto you, that although for the better furtheraunce of this Godly purpose of knityng the realmes, and for the sure defence of them which fauoureth the maryage, we are compelled for the tyme to keepe holdes and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings Maiesties minde and determinate pleasure is with our aduise and counsaile to be as before is declared, that where fauor may be shewed, not to vse rigor, if by condicions you will receyue this amitie offered, not to folowe conquest, for we desyre loue, knitie, concorde, peace, and equality. Let neither your Gouernor, nor your Kirkemen, nor those who so often hath falsifyed their fayth and promise: and by treachery and falshode be accustomed to proroge the tyme, feede you forth with fayre wordes and bring you into the snare, from whence they cannot deliuer you. They will peraduenture prouide for themselues with pencions in some other realme, & set souldiors straungers in your holdes to kepe you in subiection, vnder the pretence to defend them against vs. But who prouideth pencions for you? Holwe are you defended when they bee fledde awaye? Who conquereth you when the straunge Capitaynes hath your Holdes? when your lande is wasted, and the Realme destroyed, and the more parte kept from you? Who will set by the mariage of the Queene to buye a tytle with the warre of Englande, to mary the naine, another mightie king holding the land? If we two beyng made one by amitie, be most hable to defend vs against all nations, and hauing the sea for wall, the mutuall loue for garison, and God for defence should make so noble and well agreeing Monarchye, that neyther in peace we may be ashamed, nor in warre afrayed of any worldly or forreine power why should not you be as desirous of the same, and haue asmuch cause to reioyce at it as we? If this honor of so noble a Monarchy do not moue you to take and accept amitie? Let the griefe and the daunger of the aforenamed losses feare you to attempt that thing which shall displease God, encrease warre, daunger your realme, destroy your land, vndoe your children, waste your groundes, desolate your countryes, and bring all Scotland eyther to famine and misery, or to subiection and seruitude of another nation. We require but your promised Queene, your offered agreement of vnitie, the ioyning of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemency and tender loue that he hath declared to beare to both the nations hath offered vnto vs both, and in maner called vs both vnto it, whose calling and prouocation we haue and will follow to the best of our powers, and in his name and with his ayd, admonition, exhortation, requestes and Ambassades not beyng hable to do it and to finde stablenesse in promises, we shall not willing, but constrained pursue the battayle, chastice the wicked and malicious by the angry Angels of God, the fier and sworde. Wherefore we requyre and exhorte all you who hath loue to your countrie, pittie of that realme, a true hart to your Queene and maistres, regard of your honors and promises made by the great seale of Scotland, and who fauoreth the peace, loue, vnitie and concord, and that most profitable mariage to enter, and to come to vs, and declaring your true and godly heartes therevnto, to ayde vs in this most godly purpose and enterprise: Be witnesse of our doynges, we refuse no man, temporall, nor spirituall, Lorde ne Lard, Gentleman ne other who will ayde this our purpose, and minish the occasion of slaughter and destruction: To whome we shall kepe the promises heretofore declared, & further se reward and recompence made according to the desert. And for a more sure proofe and playner token of the good mind and will which we beare vnto you. That which neuer yet before was graunted to Scotlande in any league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, because ye shall haue proofe of the beginning of loue and amitie of both the realmes. The kinges highnesse considering the multitude of them which is come to his maiesties deuotion, and of them that be well wi'lers and ayders of this godly enterprice, hath by oure aduise and counsayle graunted and by these presentes do graunt, that from hence forth all maner of Marchauntes and other Scottishmen, who will enter their names with one of the Wardeines of the marches and there profesle to take part wyth vs in this before named godly purpose to his owne commoditie, and to serue all such as be of the same agreement: may lawfully and without any trouble and vexation enter into any porte, creeke, or hauen of England, and there vse their traffique of marchandise, bye and sell, bring in the commodities of Scotlande, and take and carye foorth the commodities of England as liberally & as freely, and with the same and none other custome or paymentes therefore, than Englishmen and the kinges subiectes doth at these presentes: Wynding further vpon the successe hereof, to gratifie so the furtherers of this most godlye enterprise and vnion, that all the worlde may be witnesse of the great zeale and loue which his highnesse doth beare towardes you and your nation. And all this the kinges highnesse by our aduise & counsaile hath willed to be declared vnto you, and geuen in commaundement vnto vs and all his Lieutenauntes, Wardeines, Rulers, and other hedde Officers, Ministers and subiectes to se executed and done according to the true purporte, effect and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

A proclamation for Enclosures.

Sone after this, the kinges Maiestie by the aduice of the Lorde Protector, and the rest of his counsayle, that is to saye, about the beginning of June, set forth a proclamation against Enclosures, for that a great number of poore men had complayned of Gentlemen and other, that they had taken from them, Common of Pasture and Common Fieldes, and had enclosed them into Parkes and pasture, and other such like for their owne commoditie and pleasure, to the vtter vndoyng of the poore men. This proclamation tending to the helpe and releefe of the poore, commaunded that such as had so enclosed the commons, should vpon a peine by a day assigned lay them out againe: But I thinke there were but few that obayed the proclamation, which thing the poore men perceyuing, and seyng none amendement follow vpon the proclamation, rashly without order tooke vpon themselues to redresse, and so gathering themselues together made them Capitaines and brake downe those inclosurs, and cast downe ditches, and in the ende plaide the very part of Rebelles and Traytors.

Insurrection in Cornwall.

But because the first stirre and commotion was made in the West partes of this realme, namely in Cornewall hauing to their Capitaines, Humfrey Arondell, Wynslade, Holmes, and Bery, it shall be verye meete first to entreate of them. These Rebels I say demaunded not onely the enlarging of Commons and disparking of Parkes as is aboue sayd: But they were chiefely offended with the alteration of religion, and desired agayne to haue the Masse, and to haue the statute of sixe articles restored vnto them. And although the kinges maiestie sent vnto them most gentle letters to cause them to be quyet, and also sent sondry Messenges vnto them, with very good admonitions, yet their rage was such, that nothing could stay them: But that they put themselues in array, and purposed to haue come thorow the realme to the king, but they were stayed at the Citie of Exceter, which Citye they besieged almost by the space of syx weekes, and the Citezens therof manfully and politiquely to their great prayse withstoode them and gaue them the repulse.

Humfrey Arondell, Winslade, Holmes, Bery.

And first for the pacifiyng of these rebelles the kinges maiestie sent by his commission the right honorable the Lorde Russell, Lorde Priuie Seale as his Lieutenaunt, and the Lorde Graye of Wilton, with a number of valiaunt aunt souldiers, among whome was three thousande of the Launce knightes that came out of Germany. And first the sayde Lorde Russell when he came thether sent vnto them the kinges Maiesties proclamation, the effect whereof was.

That all such persons as were there vnlawfully assembled, and did not within three dayes next after the proclayming thereof, yelde and submitte themselues to the Lord Priue Seale (the kinges Lieutenaunt) they should from thence forth be deemed accepted and taken for Rebels and Traitors against his most royall person, and his imperiall crowne and dignity, & farther the kings maiesty for a more terror to the rebels, and the encouragement of such of his good subiectes as shoulde helpe and ayde to apprehende and take any of the sayde Rebelles: he by his sayd proclamation did graunt and geue all the Offices, Fees, goodes and possessions, that the same Rebelles had at and before their apprehencion.

This proclamation notwithstanding, the sayd rebels, continued in their obstinacie and Trayterous purpose. Wherefore yet once againe the kinges maiesty for auoiding of the sheding of Christian bloud, sent vnto them a most gentle and louing message in writing, to haue reduced them againe to their obedience, but it would not be. The message was as followeth.

The kinges message to the Rebelles of Cornewall & Denonshire

Although knowlege hath bene geuen to vs and our derest Uncle Edward Duke of Somerset, Gouernor of our person and Protector of all our realmes dominions and subiectes, and to the rest of our priue Counsayle of diuerse assemblies made by you, which ought of dutie to be our louing Subiectes, against all order of lawe, and otherwise then euer any louing or kinde subiects hath attempted against their naturall and liege souereigne Lorde: Yet we haue thought it meete at this very first time, not to condempne and reiect you as we might iustly do, but to vse you as our subiects, thinking that the Deuil hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Englishmen, so sodainly to become enemies to our owne nattue countrie: Or of our subiectes to make you Traytors: or vnder pretence to releue your selues to destroy your selues, your wyues, children, landes, possessions and all other commodities of this your life. This we say, that we trust that although you be ignorantly seduced, ye will not be vpon knowlege obstinate: And though some amongst you (as euer there is some Cockyll amongst good corne) forget God, neglect their Prince, esteme not the state of the realme, but as careiesse desperat men delight in sedicion, tumult & warres: yet neuertheiesse the great part of you will heere the voyce of vs your naturall Prince, and will by wisedome and counsayle be warned and ceasse your enuyes in the beginning, whose endes will be, euen by God almighties order, your owne destruction. Wherfore as to you our subiects by ignorance seduced we speake, and be content to vse our princely auctoritie, like a father to his children, to admonish you of your faults not to punish them, to put you in remembrance of your dueties, not to auenge your forgetfulnesse.

Disorder in Subiectes.

First your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues agaynst other oure louing subiectes, to arraye your selues to the warre: who amongst you all can aunswere for the same to almightie God, charging you to obey vs in all things? Or howe can any good Englishe heart aunswere vs, our lawes, and the rest of our very good louing and faythfull subiects, who in deede by their obedience make our honor, estate and degree?

Ye vse our name in your writtinges, and abuse the same against our selfe: what iniurie herein do you vs to call those which loue vs to your euill purposes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordynaunce and prouydence, by our bloud and inheritaunce, by lawfull succession and our coronation. But not to this ende, as you vse our name, we are your most naturall souereigne Lord & king Edward the first, to rule you, to preserue you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes well ministred, euery man to haue his awne, to suppresse disordered people, to correct Traytors, Theeues, Pirates, Robbers and such lyke: yea to keepe our realmes from other Princes, from the malice of Scottes, of French, of the Bysshop of Rome. Thus good subiectes our name is written, thus it is honored and obeyed, this maiestie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mannes: So that of this your offence we cannot write to much, and yet doubt not but thys is ynough from a prince to al reasonable people, from a royall king to all kind hearted and louing subiects, from the puyssaunt king of Englande to euery naturall Englishe man. Abusing of the kinges name.

Your pretence, which you saye moueth you to doe thus, and wherewith you seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you is eyther all false, or so vaine that we doubt not, that after that ye shall hereby vnderstaude the truth therof, ye will all with one voyce knowledge your selues ignorauntly led, and by error seduced: And if there be any one that wil not, then assure you the same be ranke Traytors, enimies of our crowne, seditious people, heretikes, papistes, or such as care not what cause they haue to prouoke an insurrection so they may doe it, nor in deede can ware so riche with their awne labors and with peace, as they can doe with spoyles, with warres, with robberies, and such lyke, ye with the spoyle of your awne goodes, with the lyuing of your labors, the sweat of your bodyes, the foode of your awne housholdes wiues and children: Such they be, as for a time vse pleasant perswasions to you, and in the ende will cut your throates for your awne goodes. False causes.

You be borne in hande that your children, though necessitie chaunce, shall not be christened but vpon the holye dayes, howe false this is learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue set foorth by the free consent of oure whole parliament in the Englishe tongue teacheth you the contrary, euen in the first leafe, yea the first side of the first leafe of that part which entreateth of Baptisme. Good subiectes (for to other we speake not) looke and be not deceaued: They which haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destruction of you our christened subiectes. Be this knowne vnto you, our honor is so much that we may not be founde faultie of one iot or worde: Proue it, if by our lawes ye maye not christen your children when ye be disposed vpon necessitie euery daye or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended, but seyng you maye doe it how can ye beleeue them that teach you the contrarie? What think you they meane in the rest, which moue you to breake your obedience against vs your king and souereigne, vpon these so false tales and perswasions in so euydent a matter? Therefore you all which wyll knowledge vs your souereigne Lorde, and which will here the voyce of vs your king, may easily perceiue how you be decepued, and howe subtilly Traytors and Papistes, with their Baptisme.

falshood seeke to atchieue and bring their purpose to passe with your helpe: Euery Traytor will bee glad to dissemble his treason and feede it secretly, euery Papist his popery and nourishe it inwardly, and in the ende make you our subiectes partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a common weale and holynesse.

Sacrament of ỹ body. &c.

And howe are you seduced by them, which put in your heads, the blessed Sacramente of Christes bodye, should not differ from other common bread? If our lawes, proclamations and statutes be all to the contrarie, why shall any priuate man perswade you against them? we doe oure selfe in our awne heart, our counsayle in all their profession, our lawes and statutes in all purposes, our good subiectes in all our doyngs most highly esteeme that Sacrament, and vse the communion therof to our most comfort. We make so much difference therof from other commō bread, that we thinke no profite of other bread, but to maintayne our bodyes: But this blessed bread we take to be the very foode of our soules to euerlasting life. Howe thinke you good subiectes, shall not we beyng your Prince, your Lorde, your king by Gods appoyntment with truth more preuayle, then certayne euill persons with open falshood? Shall any seditious person perswade you that the sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our counsayle and by all oure good subiectes, esteemed, vsed, participated and daylie receyued? If euer ye were seduced, if euer deceyued, if euer Traytors were beleeued, if euer Papistes poysoned good subiectes it is now. It is not the christening of children, not the reuerence of the Sacrament, not the helth of your soules that they shoote at good subiectes: It is sedition: It is highe treason, it is your destruction they seeke. How craftely, how pitteously, how cunningly soeuer they doe it, with one rule, iudge yee the ende which of force must come of your purposes.

Disobedience to a king is disobedience to almightie God.

Almightie God forbiddeth vpon paine of euerlastyng dampnation, disobedience to vs your king, and in his place we rule in earth. If we shoulde be slowe? would God erre? If youre offence be towardes God? thinke you it pardoned without repentaunce? Is Goddes iudgement mutable? Your paine is dampnation, your Iudge is incorruptyble, your fault is most cruell.

Likewyse are ye euill informed in diuers other articles, as for confyrmation of your children, for the Masse, for the maner of your seruice of Matyns and Euensong: Whatsoeuer is therein ordered hath bene long debated and consulted by many learned Bishops, Doctors, and other men of great learnyng in this realme concluded, in nothing so much labour and time spent of late tyme, nothing so fully ended.

Seruice in the English tongue.

As for the seruice in the Englishe tongue hath manifest reasons for it, and yet perchaunce seemeth to you a new seruice, and in deede is none other but the olde. The selfesame wordes in Englishe which were in Latine, sauyng a fewe thinges taken out, so fonde that it had bene a shame to haue heard them in Englishe, as all they can iudge which lust to report the truth. The difference is that we ment Godly, that you our subiectes should vnderstand in Englishe, beyng your naturall Countrey tongue, that which was heretofore spoken in Latin, then seruyng onely them which vnderstood Latine, and nowe for all you which be borne Englishe. How can this with reason offend any reasonable man, that he shoulde vnderstand what any other

sayth, and so to consent with the speaker? If the seruice in the Church were good in Latine, it remayneth good in Englishe, for nothing is altered, but to speake with knowlege, that before was spoken with ignorance, and to let you understand what is sayde for you, to the entent ye may further it wyth your awne deuotion an alteration to the better, except knowlege be worse then ignorance: So that whosoeuer hath mooued you to mislyke thys order, can geue you no reason nor answere yours if ye vnderstood it. Wherfore you our subiectes remember we speake to you beyng ordeyned your Prince and king by almightie God, if any wise we coulde aduaunce Goddes honour more then we do, we would do it, and see that ye become subiectes to Goddes ordinaunce. Obey vs your Prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teache you, which haue power to rule you, and will execute our Justice if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whose fruites be nothing but wilfulnesse, disobedience, obstinacie, and destruction of the realme.

Knowlege is better then ignorance.

For the Masse, we assure you, no small studie nor trauaile hath bene spent by all the learned Clergie therein, and to aduoyde all contention thereof, it is brought euen to the very vse as Christ left it, as the Apostles vsed it, as holy fathers deliuered it: in dede somewhat altred from that ỹ Popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you may here the contrary of some Popishe and euill men, yet our Maiestie which for our honour may not be blemished nor stayned, assureth you that they deceyue you, abuse you, and blowe these opinions into your heades, for to furnishe theyr awne purposes.

The Masse.

And so likewyse iudge you of confirmation of Children, and let them answere you this one question. Thinke they that a child christened is dampned because he dyeth before Bishopping. Marke good subiectes what inconuenience hereof commeth? Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learnyng and theirs vpon shamelesse errors. To conclude, beside our gentle maner of information to you, whatsoeuer is conteyned in our booke, eyther for Baptisme, Sacrament, Masse, Confirmation, and seruice in the Church is by Parliament established, by the whole Clergie agreed, yea by the Bishops of the realme deuised, and further by Gods worde confirmed. And how dare you trust, yea how dare you geue eare without trembling to any singuler person to disalowe a Parliament? A subiect to perswade against our Maiestie, or any man of his single arrogancie agaynst the determination of the Bishoppes, and all the Clergie, any inuented argument, agaynst the worde of God.

Confirmatiõ of children.

But now you our subiectes, we resort to a greater matter of your vnkindenesse, a great vnnaturalnesse, and such an euill, that if we thought it had not beene begon of ignorance, and continued by perswasion of certain traitors amongest you, which we thinke fewe in number, but in their doynges busie, we could not be perswaded but to vse our sworde and do iustice. And as we be ordeyned of God for to redresse your errors by auengement: But loue and zeale yet ouercommeth our iust anger, but howe long that will be God knoweth, in whose hand our heart is, and rather for your awne causes beyng our christened subiectes, we would ye were perswaded then vanquished, taught, then ouerthrowen, quietly pacifyed, then rigorously persecuted.

Ye require to haue the statute of six articles reuiued, and knowe you what what ye require? Or knowe ye what ease you haue with the losse of them? They were lawes made, but quickly repented, to bloudie they were to bee borne of our people: and yet at the first in deede made of some necessitie. Oh subiectes how are ye trapped by euill persons. We of pitie because they were bloudie take them away, and you nowe of ignorance will aske them againe. You knowe full well that they helped vs to extende rygor, and gaue vs cause to drawe our swoorde very often. And since our mercy moued vs to write our lawes with mylde and equitie, howe be ye blinded to aske them in blood? But leauyng this maner of reasonyng, and resortyng to the truth of our authoritie, we let you wit, the same hath bene adnulled by Parliament with great reioyse of our subiectes, and not now to be called in question. And dare thany of you with the name of a subiect stand agaynst an act of Parliament, a lawe of the realme? What is our power if lawes should be thus neglected, or what is your suretie if lawes be not kept? Assure you most surely, that we of no earthly thing vnder the heauen make such reputation as we doe of this one, to haue our lawes obeyed, and this cause of God to be throughly mayntayned, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares bredth, nor geue place to any creature liuyng: But therin will spende our awne royall person, oure Crowne, Treasure, Realme, and all oure state, whereof we assure you of our high honour: For herein resteth our honour: herein do all kinges knowlege vs a king: And shall any one of you dare, breath, or thinke agaynst our kingdome and Crowne?

The authoritie of a parliament.

In the ende of this your request (as we be geuen to vnderstande) ye would haue them stande in force vntill our full age. To this we thinke that if ye knew what you spake, ye would not haue uttered the motion, nor neuer geuen breath to such a thought. For what thinke you of our kingdome? Be we of lesse authority for our age? Be we not your king now as we shal be? Shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we shall haue? If ye would suspend and hang our doyngs in doubt vntil our full age: ye must first knowe, as a king we haue no difference of yeres, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his sufferance shall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege Lord, the souereigne Prince of Englande, not by our age, but by Gods ordynaunce, not onely when we shall be. xxj. yeres of age, but when we were of ten yeres. We possesse our crowne not by yeres, but by the bloud and assent from our father king Henry the eyght. If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst vtter themselues would denie our kingdome. But our good subiectes knowe their prince, and will encrease, not diminishe his honor, enlarge his power, not abate it, knowledge his kingdome, not differ it to certaine yeres. All is one to speake against our crowne, and to denie our kingdome, as to require that our lawes may be broken vnto. xxj. yeres. Be we not your crowned, annoynted and established king? wherein be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse authoritie or lesse state then our progenitors kings of this realme? Except your vnkindnesse, your vnnaturalnesse will diminishe our estimation? We haue hetherto since the death of our father by the good aduise and counsayle of our dere & entirely beloued Uncle the Duke of Somerset, our Gouernour and Protector kept oure estate, maintayned oure realme, preserued our honor, defended our people from all enemies. We

haue hetherto bene feared and dread of our enimies, yea of Princes, kings and nations. Yea, herein we be nothing inferiour to any our Progenitors, which grace we knowlege to be geuen vs from God, and howe else, but by good obedience, good counsaile of our magistrates, by the authorite of our kingdome of Englande, hetherto hath gained honour during our reigne: It hath wonne of the enemy & not lost. It hath bene meruepled that we of so yong yeres haue reigned so nobly, so royally, so quietly. And how chanceth that you our louyng subiectes of that our country of Cornewall, and Deuonshire, will geue first occasion to slaunder this our realme of England, to geue courage to the enemie to note our realme of the euill of rebellion, to take it a pray to our olde enemyes, to diminish our honour which God hath geuen, our father left, our good Uncle and Counsaile preserued vnto vs? What greater euill could ye commit, then euen nowe when our forreyn enemye in Scotland, and vpon the sea seeketh to inuade vs, to do our realme dishonour then to arise in this maner agaynst our lawe, to prouoke our wrath, to aske our vengeaunce, and to geue vs an occasion to spende that force vpon you, which we meant to bestowe vpon our enemyes, to begin to slay you with that sworde that we drewe forth agaynst Scottes and other enemyes? To make a conquest of our owne people, which otherwise should haue beene of the whole realme of Scotlande? Thus farre we haue discended from our high maiestie for loue, to consider you in your simple ignoraunce, and haue beene content to sende you an instruction lyke a father, who of iustice might haue sent you your destructions like a king to rebelles. And nowe we let you knowe, that as you see our mercie abundauntly, so if ye prouoke vs further, we sweare to you by the liuyng God, ye shall feele the power of the same God in our sworde, which howe mightie it is, no subiect knoweth, how puissaunt it is, no priuate man can iudge, howe mortall it is, no Englishe man dare thinke. But surely, surely, as your Lorde and Prince, your onely king and maister, we say to you, repent your selues, and take our mercye without delay, or else we will forthwith extende our princely power, and execute our sharpe sworde agaynst you, as agaynst Infidelles and Turkes, and rather aduenture our owne royall person, state, and power, then the same shall not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certain which lately did aryse, pretending some griefes, & yet acknowleging their offences, haue not onely receyued most humbly their pardon: but feele also by our order, to whome all publique order onely appertayneth, present redresse of theyr griefes.

In the ende we admonishe you of your duties to God, whome ye shall aunswere in the day of the Lorde, and of your dueties towardes vs, whome ye shall aunswere by our order, and take our mercy whilest God so enclineth vs, least when ye shall be constrayned to aske, we shall be to much hardened in heart, to graunt it you. And where ye shall heere nowe of mercy, mercy, and life: ye shall then heere of iustice, iustice, and death. Written the. viij. of July, in the thirde yere of our reigne.

A godly and Princely admonition.

Although they receyued from the kinges Maiestie this louyng Message, and most Princely and gentle admonition, yet was their froward and indurate heartes such, that they stoode still at the swordes poynt. Wherfore Obstinacie in rebels.

the right valiant Lorde Russell, and the Lord Gray, with their whole power set vpon them, and they to their powers withstoode them very stoutlye, and at the first were many of the straungers slaine and hurt: But at the length the rebels were distressed, taken, and executed, and their foure chiefe Captaynes first named in this discourse, that is to say, Homfrey Arondell, Wynslade, Holmes, and Bury, were taken and sent to London and there according to their desertes had iudgement as traytors, and were drawen, hanged and quartered at Tiborne. And many of the people of that Countrey that were doers or mainteiners of this rebellion, were executed among them selues, and many put to great fynes, and losse of offices and liuynges, as they had right well deserued.

Execution of rebelles.

The Maior of Bodmyn in Cornewall hanged.

And among other the offendors in this rebellion I thought it well to note twoaine for the maner of their execution semed straunge. The first was one Bowyer who was Maior of a towne in Cornewall called Bodmyn. This Maior had bene busie among the rebelles, but some that loued hym sayd that he was forced thereunto, and that if he had not consented to them, they would haue destroyed him and his house. But howsoeuer it was, this was his ende. On a certaine day Sir Anthony Kingstone beyng Prouostmarshall in the field wrote his letter vnto the sayde Maior declaring that he and certayne other with him would come and dine with him such a day. The Maior seemed to be very ioyous thereof and made for him very good preparation. And at the time appoynted, Sir Anthony Kingstone with his company came and were right hartely welcomed to the Maior. And before they sate downe to dinner, sir Anthony calling the Maior a syde shewed him that their must be execution done in that towne, and therefore willed him with speede to cause a payre of Gallowes to be made, that the same might be redy by the ende of dinner. The Maior went diligently about it, and caused the same to be done. When dinner was ended Sir Anthony called the Maior vnto him and asked him if that were redy that he spake to him of, and he answered it was redy. Then he tooke the Maior by the hand and prayed him to bring him to the place where the same was, and he so did. And when sir Anthony saw them, he sayde vnto the Maior, thinke you they be strong enough? yea Sir sayd he, that they are. Well then sayd sir Anthony get you euen vp to them for they are prouided for you, the Maior cryed I trust you meane no such thing to me, Sir sayth he there is no remedy you haue bene a busie Rebell, and therefore this is appoynted for your reward, so that without longer respite or tarying, there was the Maior hanged.

At the same time also and nere vnto the place, there was a Myller who had bene a verybusy Mariet in that rebellion, whome also Syr Anthonye Kingston sought for: But the Myller had warning, and he hauing a good tall felow to his seruaunt called him vnto him and sayd, I must go foorth, if their come any to aske for me, say that thou art the owner of the Myll, and that thou hast kept the same this foure yeres, and in no wise name not me. The seruaunt promised his Maister so to do. Afterward came Syr Anthony Kingston to the Myllers house and called for the Miller, the seruaunt answered that he was the Miller. Then sayd Maister Kinston how long hast thou kept this Myll, and he answered three yeres. Well then sayde he come on thou must go with me, and caused his seruauntes to lay handes on hym, and brought him to the next tree, saying you haue bene a rebellious knaue, and therfore here shall you hang. Then cryed he & sayd that he was not the Miller, but the Millers seruaunt, well then sayd he you are a false knaue to be in two tales, therefore hange him vp sayd he, and so he was hanged. After he was hanged, one beyng by, sayd to syr Anthony Kingstone, surely this was but the Millers man, what then sayd he? could he euer haue done his Maister better seruice than to hang for him.

Common rebellion.

In this meane tyme the whole realme in a maner in euery shire were gathered together in vnlawfull assemblies, as Oxfordshire, Barkeshire, Middlesex, Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke, whose Capitaynes were, Robert Kette a Tanner, and William Kette his brother, against whome was sent by the kinges maiestie the Lorde Marques of Northhampton, beyng slenderly prouided of all thinges necessary for such an enterprise. Which beyng perceyued of the Rebelles, they tooke corage thereby the more stoutely to withstand them. Neuertheless he entred the Citie of Norwich, and lying there one night, he was sore assaulted by the rebelles, which in number were three times as many as came wyth him. By reason whereof he was forced to retire, with the losse of diuerse of his company, namely of the gentle Lord Sheffelde, who by the sayd rebelles was cruelly murdered, to the great discomfort of the sayd Lorde Marques, and other Gentlemen that at that time attended vpon him. And after the said rebels beyng puffed vp with vain glorye, did vse towardes the Gentlemen of that countrye great crueltie, in fetching them out of their houses and brought them to their camp, and compelled some of them to be their counsaylors, whether they would or not, as Sergeaunt Gaudy, Sergeaunt Catlyn, and many other: But yet they trusted them not so well, but they clapped a payre of Fetters vpon their heeles, to keepe them safe when they had them from stepping away. And the place where the common meetyng and counsaile was kept, was at a certaine tree, which they called the tree of Reformation.

Oxfordshire Barkshire, Middlesex, Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke,

After that the Lorde Marques hauyng the repulse as afore sayde, was returned. Then the kinges Maiestie sent that valiaunt and warlike knight syr John Dudley Erle of Warwick against them wyth a greater number, & better furnished: Who also had with him two thousand of ỹ Launceknights that we spake of before, which were retayned to go into Scotlande: which Launceknightes at that iourney did great and good seruice, and fought valiauntly and manfully, although many of them were slaine. Nowe when the Erle of Warwicke, who was not onely a valiant and hardie Gentleman, but also wise and politique, was come nere to the rebelles, he marched forwarde in so good order, that the rebelles began to feare. But yet as men desperate they gathered themselues together, and stoutly set forth and aduentured the battaile with the sayde Erle, who beyng a very politique Capitaine, assaulted them first with the sayde straungers, beyng footemen on the front, whilest he and his horsemen gaue the charge on the flanke of their battaile, whereby the battaile of the sayde rebelles began to breake, and in conclusion was vtterly scattered, and a great number of them slaine, and Kette their chiefe Capitaine put to flight. Neuertheless the residue, as desperate men reinforced the battaile, meanyng to make triall of a newe field. But the Erle loth to procede to the destruction of the whole number, considering that they were our awne Nation and people, did very mercifully send an Herault vnto them, saiyng, that if they woulde deliuer vnto him such as were their Capitaynes and chiefe heades, the rest should receyue the kinges most gracious pardon, and haue fre libertie to depart euery man to his house and Countrey. The which pardon they would not at the first seeme to receyue, vntill they sawe the sayde Erles maine battaile to approche, and the horsemen with the straungers readie to geue a newe onset, whereof they standyng in feare, yelded themselues vnto the kinges mercie and pardon, who accordyng to the Erles promise made by his Herault, were all pardoned, sauyng certaine to the number of. xxiiij. chiefe sturrers in this rebellion, who were presently executed. And after Robert Kett, and William Kett his brother, which before were fled, were taken, and brought first to the Erle, and then sent vp to the king to Westminster, and from thence they were sent againe into Norffolke, and there executed accordyng to their merits. Thus was this rebellion of Norffolke by the singuler prouidence and manhoode of this noble Erle pacifyed by the punishment of a fewe, without any losse of life, landes, or goodes, to any other of the Countrie.

Duryng the tyme of these commotions and sturres in Englande, the Frenche king vnderstandyng of the same, did not onely staye his power for goyng into Scotlande, but beyng in great desyre to haue agayne Bolleyne, he thought now was the time, or else neuer, wherefore with all spede possible he directed his letters to all his nobles, knightes and Capitaynes that they should vpon the sight of the sayd letters, put themselues in a redynesse, and attend vpon him with suche power and furniture as they were hable to make in the countie of Bollonoys, the first day of September next folowing. At which time the king came to Monstrell, where he founde the Constable of Fraunce and Mounsire de Aumale putting their armie in a readinesse. And the next day folowyng, the Frenche king beyng accompanyed with the sayde Lordes and their power, set forwarde towarde Bolleyn, and after came and besieged sundry pyles and fortes which the English men had there buylded and wonne them, and namely one Castell, which the English men called hable Neuse or newe Hauen, wherein as sayth the writer of the Annales of Fraunce, were foure Ensignes of Englishe men, which beyng sore beaton with the Canon, yelded to the French king. And likewise Boleyne Barke and Blacknesse, the which fortes when the French king had recouered, and had furnished them with men and munition for defence, he then returned into Fraunce with great triumph.

In this meane time, while the Frenche king was thus occupied about Bolleyn in Fraunce, the kings maiestie was still occupied in quyeting and pacifiyng of his rebellious people in Englande, and finally to pacifie them and to set them all at rest, the king published his graces most generall and free pardon to all rebels, so that they would foorthwith vpon the publication of the sayde pardon, euerye man to returne to his house and countrey, which they gladly did, and so thys seditious and most daungerous rebellion ceased.

Mary Stuart Queene of Scottes conueied into Fraunce.

Also in this busie time, Mary Stuart Queene of Scots was conueyed by Sea out of Scotland into Fraunce, and there the. xix. day of Aprill. 1548. was maryed in our Lady Church in Paris with great triumph and solempnitie, nitie vnto Fraunces the Dolphyn, eldeſt ſonne vnto king Henry the ſeconde of that name French king.

After theſe hurly burlyes were pacefied and quieted, many of the Lords of the realme, as well counſaylors as other miſlyking the gouernement of the Protector, began to withdrawe themſelues from the Courte, and reſorting to London, fell to ſecret conſultation for redreſſe of things, but namely for the diſplacing of the ſayde Lorde Protector, and ſodainely of what occaſion many maruayled and fewe knewe, euery Lorde and Counſaylor went thorowe the Citie weaponed, and had their ſeruauntes likewiſe weaponed attendyng vpon them in newe lyuerings to the wondering of many. And at the laſt, a great aſſemble of the ſayde Counſaylors was made at the Erle of Warwikes lodging which was then at Ely place in Holborne, whether all the Confederates in this matter came priuily armed, and finally concluded to poſſeſſe the Tower of London, which by the policie of Sir Wylliam Paulet Lorde Treaſorer of Englande was peaceably obteyned for them, who by order of the ſayde Confederates, immediatly remoued Sir John Markam then Lieutenant of the Tower, and placed in that rome ſyr Leonard Chamberleyne. And after that the ſayde counſayle was broken vp at Ely place, the Erle of Warwike remoued forthwith into the Citie of London, and laye in the houſe of one John Yorke Citezen of London, who was then chiefe mayſter of the Mynt in Southwarke in Suffolke place, which Yorke was ſhortly after by the ayde of the ſayde Erle of Warwike made by the king knight, by the name of ſyr John Yorke.

The counſail withdrawe themſelues into priuate conferences.

The Lorde Protector hearing of the maner of the aſſembly of this counſaile, & of the taking of the Tower which ſeemed to him verie ſtraunge and doubtfull, did preſently the ſaide night remoue from Hampton Court, taking the king with him vnto the Caſtell of Wyndſore, and there began to fortefie the ſame.

The Protector remoueth in haſte with the king to Windſore.

The Lordes of the Counſayle beyng then in London as aforeſaide conferred with the Maior of London and his brethren, firſt wylling them to cauſe a good and ſubſtantiall watch by night, and a good warde by daye to be kept for the ſafegarde of the Citie, and the portes and gates thereof, which was conſented vnto: and the Companyes of London in their turnes warned to watch and warde accordingly.

Then the ſayd Lords and counſaylors demaunded of the Lord Maior and his brethren fiue hundred men to ayde them to fetch the Lorde Protector out of Wyndſore from the king. But therevnto the Maior aunſwered that he could graunt no ayde without the aſſent of the common counſayle of the Citie. Wherevpon the next daye, a common counſayle was ſommoned to the Guyldhall in London.

But in this meane time, the ſayde Lordes of the counſayle aſſembled themſelues at the Lorde Maiors houſe of London, who then was ſyr John Aimcotes Fiſhemonger, and William Locke Mercer, and ſyr John Aleph Shirieſes of the ſayde Citie. And there the ſayde Counſaile agreed and publiſhed a proclamation forthwith againſt the Lorde Protector, the effect of which proclamation was as foloweth.

A proclamation publiſhed againſt the Lord Protector.

Firſt, that the Lord Protector by his malicious and euill gouernement was the occaſion of al the ſedition that of late had happened w in the realme.

The losse of the kings peeces in Fraunce.

That he was Ambicious and sought his awne glory, as appered by his building of most sumpteous and costly houses, and specially in the time of the kings warres, and the kings souldiours vnpayde.

That he esteemed nothing the graue counsayle of the Counsaylors.

That he sowed sedicion betweene the nobles, the gentlemen & commons.

That the nobles assembled themselues together at London for none other purpose, but to haue caused the Protector to haue lined within lymits, and to haue put suche order for the kings maiestie as apperteyned, whatsoeuer the Protectors doings were, which (as they sayde) were vnnaturall, ingrate and Trayterous.

That the Protector slaundered the counsayle to the king, and did that in him laye to cause variaunce betweene the king and his nobles.

That he was a great Traytor, and therefore the Lordes desired the Citie and the commons to ayde them to take him from the king. And in witnesse and testimonie of the contentes of the sayde proclamation, the Lordes subscribed their names and tytles, beyng sixtene in number.

After the aforesayd proclamation was proclaymed, the Lordes or the most part of them continuing and lyeng in London, came the next day to the Guyldhall during the time that the Lord Maior & his brethren, sate in their court or inner chamber, and entred and commoned a long whyle with them, and at the last, the Maior and his brethren came forth vnto the comon counsayle, where was read the kinges letter sent vnto the Maior and Citezens, commaunding them to ayd him with fiue hundred men, and to send the same to his Castell at Windsore: and to the same letter was adioyned the kinges hand and the Lorde Protectors. On the otherside by the mouth of the Recorder, it was requested that the Citezens would graunt their ayde rather vnto the Lordes, for that the Protector had abused both the kinges maiestie and the whole Realme, and without that he were taken from the king, and made to vnderstand his folly, this realme was in great hasard, and therfore required ꝑ the Citezens would willingly assent to ayd the Lordes with fiue hundred men, herevnto was none other answere made but silence. But the Recorder (who at that time was a worthy Gentleman called Maister Brooke) still cryed vppon them for aunswer. At the last stepped vp a wise and good Citezen and sayd, in this case it is good for vs to thinke of thinges past to auoide the daunger of thinges to come. I remember, sayth he, in a story written in Fabians Chronicle, of the warre betweene the king and his Barons, which was in the time of king Henry the third, and the same time the Barons as our Lordes do now demaunded ayde of the Maior and Citie of London, & that in a rightfull cause for the common weale, which was for the execution of diuers good lawes, wherevnto the king before had geuen his consent, and after would not suffer them to take place, and the Citie did ayde the Lords, & it came to an open battayl, wherin the Lordes preuayled and toke the king and his sonne prisoners, and vpon certaine condycions, the Lordes restored againe the king and his sonne to their liberties. And among all other conditions, this was one that the king should not only graunt his pardon to the Lords, but also to the Citezens of London, which was graunted, yea and the same was ratefied by act of parliament. But what followed of it?

The kinges letter read to the Citizens.

A Citizens tale tolde in the common counsaile in London.

it? was it forgotten? no surely, nor forgeuen during the kinges life, the lyberties of the Citie were taken away, Straungers appoynted to be our Heades and Gouernors, the Citizens geuen away bodye and goodes, and from one persecution to another, were most miserably afflicted, suche it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salomon sayth, the wrath & indignation of a Prince is death. Wherefore forasmuch as this ayde is requyred of the kinges maiestie, whose voyce we ought to hearken vnto, for he is our high shepherd, rather then vnto ỳ Lords: and yet I would not wish the Lords to be clerely shakē of, but that they with vs and we with them may ioyne in suite and make our most humble petition to the kinges maiestie, that it woulde please his highnesse to heere such complaynt against the gouernement of the Lorde Protector as maye be iustly alleged and proued. And I doubt not, but this matter will be so pacefied, that neither shall the king, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to seeke for further ayde, neyther we to offend any of them both. After this tale, the commons staied, and the lord Maior and his brethren for that time brake vp, and afterwarde commoned with the Lordes.

The Lordes sate the next daye in counsayle in the Starre Chamber and from thence they sent Sir Phillipe Hobby, with their letter of credence to the kinges maiestie, beseching his highnesse to geue credite to that which the sayd Sir Phillip should declare vnto his maiestie in their names: and the king gaue him libertie to speake, and most gently heard all that he had to saye. And truely he did so wisely declare his message, and so gravely tolde his tale in the name of the Lordes, but therewithall so vehemently and so grieuously against the Protector, who was also there present by ỳ king, that in the ende, the Lord Protector was commaunded from the kinges presence and shortly was committed to ward in a Tower within the Castel of Windsore called Beauchampes Tower. And sone after were staied Sir Thomas Smith, Maister Whalley, Maister Fissher, and many other Gentlemen that attended vpon the Lorde Protector. And the same daye, the Lordes of the Counsayle came to Wyndsore to the king, and the next day they brought from thence the Lorde Protector and the other that were there stayed, and conueied them through the Citie of London with as much wonderment as might be vnto the Tower, where they remayned prisoners.

Sir Philip Hobby sent to the king by the Lordes.

The Lorde Protector commited to the Tower.

Shortly after the Lordes resorted vnto the Tower, and there charged the Protector with sundry articles, which for tediousnesse I omyt.

Shortly after this, the kings maiestie called his high Court of parliament, and helde the same at Westminster, the .xviij. day of Nouember, in the thirde yere of his reigne, and there contynued the same vntyll the first daye of Februarye next folowyng, which was in the fourth yere of his graces reigne. And among other thinges there enacted and concluded, one statute was made for the punishment of rebelles and vnlawfull assemblies, the which lawe was made by occasion of the late rebellion that had happened in maner throughout the realme the yere passed, and was not thought nor ment to haue touched anye Noble man, and specially none such as the Duke of Sommerset was, which after as it shall appere it did, and by that statute he was condemned within two yeres next after.

remembraunce howe the last yere in the time of rebellion, the French king had entred into Bullonoys, and wonne dyuers of the Englishe forts there, beyng of great importaunce for the defence of the towne and Countrey, the default whereof was imputed to the negligent gouernement of the Lorde Protector. And forsomuch as they well vnderstood that the Frenche king vpon further practise, had placed a Capitayne called the Rhynegrane with dyuers regiments of Almayne, Launceknightes and certayne ensignes of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or fiue thousande at the towne of Marguyson, beyng the midway betweene Bolleyn and Calice, to the great perill and daunger as well of the Countie of Bullonoys as also of Calice, Guysnes and all the lowe countrey. The king therfore for the defence of the sayde Frontiers, caused all the straungers, which had serued that yere against the rebels, beyng to the number of two thousande, to be transported ouer the Sea to the Marches of Calice. And at Chrystmas next folowyng by order of the sayde Erle and of the Counsaylors aforesayde, Fraunces Erle of Huntyngdon with syr Edwarde Hastynges his brother, Sir James Croft, Sir Leonard Chamberleyn, and dyuers other Cappytaines and souldyours to the number of three thousand were sent ouer to the Marches of Calice to ioyne with the sayde straungers, minding with as conuenient speede as they might to remoue the Campe, and otherwise to annoy the French. And about the seauenth day of Februarie certayne commissioners appoynted for this treatie, that is to wyt, the Erle of Bedford, the Lorde Paget, Sir William Peter the kinges chiefe Secretary, and syr John Mason arryued at Calice: By reason of whose comming, the Erle of Huntyngdon and the armie sent ouer before for the defence of the Frontires were countermaunded from anye further attempt, so that little or nothing was done in that voyage, sauing certaine skirmishes at dyuers times, not much materiall to be written of.

Commissioners sent to treat of peace

These commissioners beyng thus arryued, passed from Calice to Bolleyne, there to meete with the commissioners appointed by the French king where as a certayne house was newly erected for the sayd treatie to be had, which was vpon the side of Boleyn hauen next to Fraunce, where after dyuers meetings and conferences of the commissioners of eyther partie, a finall peace was at the last concluded betweene both the realmes. But chiefly among other thinges, for the restitution of Bolleyn and Bollonoys vnto the French, which was vpon certayne conditions folowyng.

First that the French king should yeelde and paye to the king of Englande a certayne somme of money, and the same to be payde at two payments, as it was then agreed, and for the same somme, the king of Englande should render the towne of Bolleyne, and all the Fortes thereto adioyning, which he then enioyed, with all suche artillarie and munition as was there founde at the taking of the same vnto the french king. And for the sure payment of the sayde sommes, the french king sent into Englande for hostages and pledges, the Countie of Angwyn, Lewys the Lorde of Uendosme hys brother, the Uidame of Charters, and Duke de Aumale and other. And on saint Markes daye next folowyng, beyng the .xxv. daye of Aprill about eyght of the clock in the morning, the Englishe men did delyuer to the french men the possession of Bolleyn, and the Castels and Fortes

And the fiftene day next folowyng, the French king entred into the sayde towne of Bolleyn, with Trumpets blowen, and with all the royall tryumph that might be, where he offered one great Image of Siluer of our Ladye in the Church there, which was called oure Ladye Church. The which Image he had causeꝺ specially to be made in the honoꝛ of the sayde Ladie, and causeꝺ the same to be set vp in the place where the lyke Image befoꝛe did stande, the which befoꝛe was taken awaye by the Englishe men at the wynning of the towne.

Soone after this agreement, the Duke of Sommerset late Pꝛotectoꝛ, was deliuered out of the Tower, and because of suspition of displeasure and hatred that was thought to be betweene the Erle of Warwike, and the Duke of Sommerset, a meane was found that their friendship shoulde be renued thꝛough alliaunce, and a mariage was concluded betweene the Erle of Warwickes eldest sonne, and the Duke of Sommersets eldest daughter, the which maryage was solempnised at Shene, the king beyng then pꝛesent.

The Duke of Somerset deliuered out of ỹ Tower.

After the solemnitie of this mariage, there appered outwardly to the woꝛlde great loue and friendship betweene the Duke and the Erle, but by reason of Caitales and flatterers, the loue continued not long, howbeit many did very earnestly wishe loue and amitie to continue betweene them.

About this tyme there was at Feuersham in Kent a Gentleman named Arden most cruelly murdered and slaine bythe pꝛocurement of his owne wyfe. And she foꝛ the same fact was burned at Cauntoꝛbury, and certaine other that were the doers therof were hanged in diuers places of the realme.

Arden murthered.

At this tyme also the kinges Maiestie called his highe Court of Parliament, and helde the same at Westminster the.xxiij. day of January, in the fift yere of his reigne, and there continued the same vntil the. xb. day of Apꝛil in the sixt yere of his reigne.

A parliament

In this Parliament the booke of common pꝛayer, which in some part had bene coꝛrected and amended, was newly confirmed and established. And in the ende of this Parliament there chaunced a great and contagious sickenesse to happen in ỹ realme, which was called the sweatyng sickenesse, wherof a great number of people dyed in a small tyme, namely in the Citie of Lõdon. And it seemed that God had appoynted the sayde sickenesse onely foꝛ the plague of Englishmen, foꝛ the most that died thereof were men and not women noꝛ childꝛen. And it so folowed the Englishmen, that such Marchants of England as were in Flaunders and Spaine, and other Countries beyond the sea were visited therewithall, and none other nation infected therewith. And it began first in Apꝛill in the Noꝛth partes, and so came thꝛough the realme, and continued vntill September next folowyng. The disease was sodaine and grieuous, so that some beyng in perfite health in one houre, were gone and dead within foure houres next folowyng And the same being whote and terrible infoꝛced the people greatly to call vpon God, and to doe many deedes of Charitie: But as the disease ceassed, so the deuocion quickly decayed.

The sweting sickenesse,

At this tyme also, the kinges Maiestie with the aduice of his pꝛiuye Counsaile, and hauyng also great conference with Marchauntes and other, perceiuyng that by such coynes and copper moneys as had bene coyned in the the tyme of the king his father, and nowe were commonly currant in the realme, and in dede a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were currannt at, to the great dishonor of the kinges Maiestie and the realme, and to the deceyte and no little hinderaunce of all the kinges Maiesties good subiectes, did now purpose not onely the abacyng of the sayd copper moneys, but also ment wholy to reduce them into Bollion, to the entent to deliuer fine & good moneis for them. And therfore in the Moneth of July by his graces Proclamation, he abaced the peece of.xij. pence comonly called a Teston vnto. ix. pence, & the peece of foure pence vnto three pence. And in August next folowyng, the peece of.ix. pence was abaced to six pence, and the peece of three pence vnto two pence, and the penny to an halfepenny.

The Duke of Somerset againe apprehended and committed to the Tower.

The. xj. day of October, there was a great creation of Dukes & Erles, as the Lord Marques Dorset was created Duke of Suffolke, the Erle of Warwicke made Duke of Northumberland, & the Erle of Wiltshire made Marques of Winchester, & syr William Herbert maister of the horse, was made Erle of Pembrooke, and diuers Gentlemen were made knightes.

The. xbj. day of the said month being Fryday, the Duke of Sommerset was againe apprehended, and his wife also, and committed to the Tower, and with him also were comitted sir Highell Stanhop, sir Thomas Arondell, sir Raufe Iuane, sir Miles Partridge, and other, for suspition of treason and felony, whereof, they all were shortly after indicted, and so standyng indicted, the seconde day of December next folowyng, the sayde Duke was brought out of the Tower of London with the Axe of the Tower borne before him, with a great number of Billes, Gleues, Holbardes, and Polaxes, attendyng vpon him, and so came into Westminster Hall, where was made in the middle of the Hall a new Scaffold, where all the Lordes of the kings Counsaile sate as his Iudges, and there was he arreigned and charged with many articles both of treason and felony. And when after much milde speche he had aunswered not giltie, he in all humble maner put himselfe to be tryed by his Peeres, who after long consultation among themselues, gaue their verdict that he was not giltie of the treason, but of the felony. The people there present which was a great number, heeryng the Lordes say not giltie, which was to the treason, thinkyng most certainly that he was clerely acquited, and chiefly for that, immediately vpon the pronouncyng of those wordes, he that caryed the Axe of the Tower, departed with the Axe, they made such an outcrie and ioy, as the lyke hath not bene heard, which was an euident declaration of their good willes borne towardes him: But nevertheleſſe, he was condempned to the death, whereof shortlye after he tasted. The felonie that he was condempned of, was vpon the statute made the last yere agaynst rebelles and vnlawfull assemblyes, wherein among other thinges is one braunch, that whosoeuer shall procure the death of any Counsaylor, that euery such attempt or procurement shall be felonye. And by force of that statute the Duke of Sommerset beyng accompanyed with certaine other, was charged that he purposed and attempted the death of the Duke of Northumberlande, the Lorde Marques, the Lorde of Pembroke, and others of the priuie Counsaile, the which by statute was felony.

After the Duke was thus condempned, he was againe returned to the Tower, and landed at the Crane of the Vintrye, and so passed through London, don, where were both exclamations, the one cryed for ioye, that he was acquipted, the other cryed out that he was condempned. But howsoeuer they cryed, he was conueied to the Tower of London, where he remayned vntill the.xxij. daye of Januarp next following.

The Duke beyng condempned as is aforesayd, the people spake diuersly and murmured against the Duke of Northumberlande, and against some other of the Lordes for the condempnation of the sayd Duke, and also as the common fame went, the kinges maiestie tooke it not in good part: wherfore albeit to remoue fond talke out of mennes mouthes, as also to recreate and refreshe the troubled spirites of the yong king, it was deuised that the feast of Christes Natiuitie, commonly called Christmas then at hand, should be solemply kept at Greenewiche with open houshold, and franke resorte to the Court, (which is called keping of the Hall,) what time of olde ordinarye course, there is alwayes one appoynted to make sporte in the Courte, called commonly Lorde of Misrule, whose office is not vnknowne to such as haue beene brought vp in Noblemens houses, and among great house keepers, which vse liberall feasting in that season. There was therefore by order of the counsaile a Gentleman both wise and learned, whose name was George Ferrers appoynted to that office for this yere: who beyng of better calling then commonly his predecessors had bene before, receyued all his commissions and warrauntes by the name of the Maister of the kinges pastimes. Which Gentleman so well supplyed his office, both in shew of sundry sightes and deuises of rare inuention, and in act of diuers enterludes and matters of pastime, played by persons, as not onely satisfied the common sorte, but also were very well liked and allowed by the counsayle and other of skill in the like pastimes: But best of al by the yong king himselfe, as appered by his princely liberalitie in rewarding that seruice.

This Christmas being thus passed and spent with much mirth and pastime, wherewith the mindes and eares of murmurers were meetely well appeased, according to a former determination as the sequele shewed, it was thought now good to proceede to the execution of the iudgement geuen against the Duke of Somerset touching his conuiction and attaynder of the felony afore mencioned. Wherevpon the.xxij. daye of Januarp then next following beyng Fryday, he was brought out of the Tower, and according to the manner deliuered to the Shrifes of London, and so with a great companp of the Gard and other with weapones, was brought vnto the Skaffolde, where he should suffer. And there nothing changyng voyce nor countenaunce, but in a maner with the same gesture that he partely vsed at home kneling downe vpon both his knees, and lifting vp his handes erected himselfe vnto God. And after that he had ended a few shorte prayers, standing vp againe and turning him selfe towardes the East syde of the Skaffolde, he vttered to the people these wordes in effect.

The execution of the Duke of Sommerset.

Derely beloued Maisters and friendes, I am brought hether to suffer, albeit that I neuer offended against the king, neyther by worde nor deede, and haue bene alwayes as faythfull and as true vnto the realme as any man hath beene. But forsomuch as I am by a lawe condempned to dye, I do acknowlege my selfe as well as other to be subiect therevnto. Wherefore to expresse and testefie my obedience, which I owe vnto the lawes, I am

The Duke of Sommersets saying to the people.

come hether to suffer death, wher vnto I willingly offer my selfe, geuing most hartie thanks vnto the Diuine goodnesse, as if I had receyued a most ample and great reward: For this it is thought good in the sight of the most mercifull father now to graunt me this time of repentance, & to acknowlege my self, who might through sodaine death haue stopped my breath, that I should neyther acknowlege him nor my selfe, in which behalfe I worthely with my whole hart render thankes vnto him. And moreouer gentle friends, there is yet some what that I must put you in mynde of, herely as touching religion, which so long as I was in authority I did alwayes diligently set forth vnto you, neither do I repent me of my doings, but rather therof take most abundaunt and true occasion of reioysing, now that the state of Christian religion seemeth to drawe most nere vnto the forme of an order of the Primatiue Church. Of which thing I do not onely reioyce, but also interpret it as a great benefite geuen of God both vnto you and me, most hartely exhorting you all that this which is most purely set forth vnto you, you will with like thankfulnesse accept & embrace and set out the same in your liuinges, which thing if you do not, great mischiefe and perill will follow.

A sodaine feare amongst the people.

And when he had spoken the aforesayd wordes, sodaynely a terror and feare possessed all mennes hartes, and surely the people present were so dismayde, that they ranne together vpon heapes, and fled as though they had seene some armed men to make resistaunce and cryed out, Iesus saue vs, Iesus saue vs. Those which taried still in their places knew not where they were. The diuerse and sundrye noyses of those which cryed oute, made the sodaine tumulte muche more confused then it would haue beene, albeit of it selfe it was troublesome enough, for as euery man thought himselfe to be in daunger, so he cryed out, so many and sundrye noyses were heard, this waye and that way they come.

In the meane time whilst these things were thus in doyng, the people by chaunce espyed one Syr Anthony Browne knight, ridyng toward the Scaffolde, which was the occasion of a new noyse: For when they saw him comming, euen at that time, they suspected that which was not true, & yet notwithstanding, it was that which they all wished for, that the king by that messenger, had sent his Vncle pardon, and therefore with great reioysing they cryed out pardon, pardon is come, God saue the king.

The truth of this hurly burlye grewe hereof, as it was after well knowne. The maner and custome is that when such executions are done out of the Tower, the inhabitaunts of certayne Hamlets round about London, as Hoggsdon, Newyngton, Shoredich and other are commaunded to geue their attendaunce with weapons vpon the Lieutenaunt. And at this tyme, the Duke being vpon the Scaffolde by eyght of the clocke in the morning, the people of one of the Hamlets came late, and comming thorough the posterne gate espying the Duke on the Scaffolde, made haste and beganne to runne, and cryed to their felowes that were behind come away, come away. The people sodainely beholding them to come running with weapons, and knewe not the cause cried away, away, by reason whereof the people ranne euery way, not knowing whether nor wherefore.

The Duke in the meane time standing still both in the same place and minde where he was before with his Cap which he shooke with his hande made a signe vnto the people, that they should kepe themselues quiet, which thing being done and silence obteyned, he spake to them the seconde time in this maner.

Dearely beloued friendes, there is no suche matter here in hande as you vainely hope or beleue, it seemeth thus good vnto almightie God, whose ordinaunce it is meete and necessary that we all be obedient vnto, wherfore I pray you all to be quyet and without tumult, for I am euen nowe quyet, and let vs ioyne in prayer vnto the Lorde for the preseruation of our noble king, vnto whose maiestie I wishe contynuall health with all felicitie and abundaunce and all maner of prosperous successe, whereunto the people cryed out Amen. Moreouer sayth the Duke, I wishe vnto all his counsaylors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they maye rule all thinges vprightly with iustice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lorde to shewe your selues obedient, the which is also verye necessarie for you vnder the paine of condempnation, and also most profitable for the preseruation and sauegarde of the kings maiestie. And forsomuch as heretofore, I haue had often times affaires with diuers men, and that it is heard to please euerye man, therefore if there be any man that hath bene offended or iniured by me, I most humbly require and aske him forgeuenesse. But especially almightie God, whome thorowout all my life I haue most greeuously offended. And vnto all other whatsoeuer they be that haue offended mee, I doe with my whole heart forgeue them. And once agayne derely beloued in the Lord I require you that you will keepe your selues quiet and still, least thorowe your tumult you might cause mee to haue some trouble, which in this case would nothing at all profite me, neyther be any pleasure vnto you. For albeit the spirite be wylling and readie, the flesche is frayle and wauering, and through your quietnesse, I shall be much more the quieter: But if that you fall to tumult it will be great trouble and no gayne at all vnto you. Moreouer I desire you to beare me witnesse that I die here in the fayth of Iesu Christ, desiring you to helpe me with your prayers, that I maye perseuer constant in the same vnto my liues ende. Then he turning himselfe about kneeled downe vpon hys knees, vnto whome Doctor Coxe which was there present to counsayle and aduertise him, delyuered a certaine scroll into his hande, wherein was conteyned a briefe confession vnto God, which beyng read he stood vp agayne on his feete, without any trouble of minde as it appered, and first bade the Shrieues farewell, then the Lieutenant of the Tower, and certayne other that were on the Scaffolde, taking them all by the handes. Then he gaue the executioner certayne money, which done, he put of his Gowne, and kneeling downe agayne in the strawe, vntyed hys shyrt strings, and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe hys coller rounde about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his owne handkerchefe, lifting vp hys eyes vnto heauen, where his onely hope remayned, layde himselfe downe along and there suffered the heauie stroke of the axe, which disseuered the head from his bodye, to the lamentable sight and griefe of thousands that heartily prayed God for him, and entirely loued him.

The death of the Duke of Somerset.

This Duke was in high fauour and estimation with king Henry the eyght, of whome he receyued sundry high and great preferments, by reason that the sayde king had maryed the Lady Jane his sister, by whome he had issue king Edward the sixt. He was not onely curteous, wise and gentle, beyng daylie attendaunt at the Court, but forwarde and fortunate in seruice abroade, as maye well appere in his sundry voyages both in Fraunce and Scotlande, he was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemished by any thing so much as by the death of the Admiral his natural brother, which could not haue bene without his consent.

Sir Raufe Iuane, Sir Myles Partridge, Sir Wighel Stanhop, Sir Thomas Irondel

The.xxvj. day of Februarie next folowyng, for the lyke felony that the Duke of Sommerset was condempned, were also executed and hanged on a gallowes nere vnto the scaffolde on Tower hill, sir Raufe Iuane, and sir Myles Partridge knightes. And the same day was for the same cause and matter sir Wighell Stanhop, and sir Thomas Irondell beheadded on the Scaffolde.

Not long after the death of the sayd Duke and his complices, it chaunced the reuerend father in God Maister Doctor Ridley then Bishop of London to preach before the kinges Maiestie at Westminster. In the which sermon he made a fruitfull and Godly exhortation to the riche, to be merciful vnto the poore, and also moued such as were in authoritie to trauaile by some charitable waye and meane to comfort and relieue them. Wherevpon the kinges Maiestie beyng a Prince of such towardnesse and vertue for hys yeres, as Englande before neuer brought forth, and the same also beyng so well treyned and brought vp in al Godly knowlege, aswell by his dere Uncle the late Protector, as also by his verteous and learned Scholemaisters, was so carefull of the good gouernment of the realme, and chiefly to do and preferre such thinges as most specially touched the honor of almightie God. And vnderstandyng that a great number of poore people did swarme in this realme, and chiefly in the Citie of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did sodainly and of himselfe send to the sayd Bishop assoone as his Sermon was ended, willyng him not to depart vntill that he had spoken with him (and this that I nowe write was the verye report of the sayde Bishop Ridley) and accordyng to the kinges commaundement, he gaue hys attendaunce. And so soone as the kinges Maiestie was at leysure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto hym into a great Galery at Westminster wherein to his knowlege, and the king also tolde him so, there was present no mo persons then they two, and therfore made him sit downe in one chaire, and he himselfe in another, which as it seemed were before the cõming of the Bishop there purposely set, and caused the Bishop mauger his teeth to be couered, and then entred communication with him in this sort, first geuing him most heartie thankes for his Sermon and good exhortation, and therein rehersed such speciall thinges as he had noted, and that so many that the Bishop sayde, truly, truly, for that was commonly his othe, I could neuer haue thought ỹ excellency to haue bene in his grace, that I behelde & saw in him. At the last the kings Maiestie much commended him for his exhortation for the releefe of the poore, but my Lorde sayth he, ye willed such as are in authoritie to be carefull thereof, and to deuise some good order for theyr releefe, wherein I thinke you meant me, for I am in highest place, and therefore am the first that must make aunswere vnto God for my negligence if I shoulde not be carefull therein, knowyng it to be the expresse commaundement of al-mightie god, to haue compassion of his poore and nedie members for whom we must make an accompt vnto him. And truely my Lorde I am before all things most willyng to trauayle that way, and I doubt nothing of your long and approued wisedome and learnyng, who hauyng such good zeale as wisheth helpe vnto them, but that also that you haue had some conference with others what wayes are best to be taken therein, the which I am desirous to vnderstand, and therefore I pray you say your minde.

The Bishop thinkyng least of that matter, and beyng amased to here the wisedome and earnest zeale of the king, was, as he sayd himselfe so astonied, that he could not well tell what to say. But after some pawse, sayd, that as he thought at this presence for some entraunce to be had, it were good to practise with the Citie of London, because a nũber of the poore there are very great, and the Citizens are many and also wise. And he doubted not but they were also both pitifull and mercifull, as the Maior and his brethren, and other the worshipfull of the sayd Citie, and that if it would please the kinges Maiestie to direct his gracious letter vnto the Maior of London, willyng hym to call vnto him such assistaunce as he should thinke meete to consult of thys matter, for some order to be taken therein, he doubted not but good should folow therof. And he himselfe promised the king to be one that would earnestly trauaile therein. The king forthwith not onely graunted his letter, but made the Bishop tary vntill the same was written, and his hand and signet set therevnto, and commaunded the Bishop not onely to deliuer the same letter himselfe, but also to signifie vnto the Maior that it was the kings speciall request and expresse commaundement, that the Maior should therein trauaile, and assoone as he might conueniently geue knowlege vnto him how farre he had proceded therein. The Bishop was so ioyous of the hauing of this letter, and that he had nowe an occasion to trauaile in that good matter, wherein he was meruaylous zelous, that nothing could more haue pleased and delighted him: Wherefore the same night he came to the Maior of London, who then was sir Richard Dobbes knight, & deliuered the kinges letter, and shewed his message with effect. The Maior not only ioyously receyued this letter, but with all speede agreed to set forward this matter, for he also fauoured it very much. And the next day beyng Monday, he desired the Bishop of London to dine with him, and agaynst that tyme the Maior promised that he would sende for such men, as he thought meetest to talke of this matter, and so he did. And sent first for two Aldermen, and sir Commoners, and afterward were appointed more to the number of. xxiiij. And in the ende after sundrie metynges, (for by the meane of the good diligence of the Bishop, it was well followed) they agreed vpon a booke that they had deuised, wherein first they considered of. iij. speciall kindes or sortes of poore people, and those they brought into these three degrees.

Poore by casualtie.
Thriftlesse poore.
} Three degrees of poore.

1 The poore by impotencie are also deuided into three kyndes, that is to say.
1 The fatherlesse or poore mans childe.
2 The aged, blinde, and lame.
3 The diseased perso, by lepry, dropsy. &c

2 The poore by caſualtie are alſo three kyndes, that is to ſay.
4 The wounded Souldior.
5 The decayed houſeholder.
6 The viſited with grieuous diſeaſe.

3 The thriftleſſe poore are three kyndes, that is to ſay.
7 The rioter that conſumeth all.
8 The vagabond that will abide in no place.

Chriſtes Hoſpitall.

For theſe ſortes of poore were prouided three ſeuerall houſes, firſt for the innocent and fatherleſſe, which is the Beggers childe, and is in deede the ſeede & breeder of beggery, they prouided the houſe that was the late Graie Fryers in London, and nowe is called Chriſtes Hoſpitall, where the poore children are trayned in the knowlege of God and ſome vertuous exerciſe to the ouerthrow of beggery.

Saint Thomas hoſpital.

For the ſeconde degree, is prouided the Hoſpitall of Saint Thomas in Southwarke, and Saint Bartholomewe in Weſt Smithfielde, where are continually at the leaſt two hundred diſeaſed perſones which are not only there lodged and cured, but alſo fed and noriſhed.

Bridewell.

For the thirde degree, they prouided Bridewell, where the Vagabond and ydle ſtrumpet is chaſtiſed and compelled to labour, to the ouerthrowe of the vicious life of ydleneſſe.

They prouided alſo for the honeſt decayed houſholder, that he ſhould be releeued at home at hys houſe, and in the pariſhe where he dwelled by a weekely reliefe and pencion. And in like maner they prouided for the Lazer to keepe him out of the Citie from clapping of diſhes, and ringing of belles, to the great trouble of the Citezens, and alſo to the daungerous infection of many, that they alſo ſhould bee releeued at home at their houſes wyth ſeuerall pencions.

Nowe after this good order taken, and the Citezens by ſuche meanes as was deuiſed, willing to further the ſame. Then report thereof was made vnto the kings Maieſtie: And his grace for the aduauncement therof, was not onely wylling to graunt ſuch as ſhould be the ouerſeers and gouernors of the ſayde houſes a corporation and authoritie for the gouernement thereof: But alſo required that he might be accompted as the chiefe Founder and Patrone thereof: And for the furtheraunce of the ſayde worke and contynual maintenance of the ſame, he of his meere mercie and goodneſſe graunted, that where before certaine landes were geuen to the maintenaunce of the houſe of the Sauoy, founded by king Henry the ſeuenth, for the lodging of pilgrimes and ſtraungers, and that the ſame was nowe made but a lodging of loyterers, vagabondes and ſtrumpets that lay all day in the fieldes, and at night were harbored there, the which was rather the maintenaunce of beggery, then the reliefe of the poore, gaue the ſame landes beyng firſt ſurrendered into his handes by the maiſter and felowes there, which landes were of the yerely value of ſixe hundred pounde, vnto the Citie of London, for the maintenaunce of the foundation afore ſayde. And for a further reliefe, a petition beyng made to the kinges Maieſtie for a licence to take in mortmayne, or otherwiſe without licence landes to a certayne yerely value, and a ſpace left in the patent for his grace to put in what ſomme it ſhould pleaſe him: he looking on the boyde place called for pen and ynke, and with hys awne hand wrote this summe, in these maner of wordes (foure thousand markes by yere) and then sayd in the heeryng of his counsaile, Lord God I yeelde thee most harty thanks that thou hast geuen me like thus long, to finish this worke to ỹ glorie of thy name. After which foundation established, he liued not aboue two daies.

A blessed king.

By example of which act of this vertuous yong king, sir William Chester knight and Alderman of London, & John Calthrop Citizen and Draper of the sayd City, at their awne proper costes and charges made the brickwalles & way on the backside, that leadeth from the sayd new Hospitall vnto the Hospital of S. Bartholomewes: and also couered and bawted the towne ditch from Aldersgate to Newgate, which before was very noisome & contagious vnto ỹ said Hospital.

Sir William Chester knight.

John Calthrop Draper.

This Hospitall, beyng thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Castell Alias Casteller Shoomaker dwellyng in Westminster, a man of great trauaile and labour in his facultie with his awne handes, and such a one as was named the Cocke of Westminster, for that Winter and Sommer he was at his worke before foure of the clocke in the morning. This man thus truely and painfully laborying for his liuyng, God blessed and encreased his labors so abundantly, that he purchased landes and tenements in Westminster to the yerely value of. xliij. pound. And hauing no childe, with the consent of his wife (who also yet liueth and is a vertuous and good woman) gaue the same landes wholy to Christes Hospital aforesayd to the releefe of the innocent and fatherlesse children, and for the succour of the miserable sore and sicke harbored in the other Hospitalles about London, whose example God graunt many to follow.

About this time there were three noble ships set forth and furnished for the great aduenture of the vnknowne voyage into the East, by the North seas. The great doer & encourager of which voiage was Sebastian Gaboto an English man, borne at Bristow, but was the sonne of a Genoway. These ships at the last arriued in the country of Muscouia, not without great losse & daũger, and namely of their capitain, who was a worthy & aduenterous gentleman called sir Hugh Willoughby knight, who beyng tossed & driuen by tempest, was at the last found in his ship frosen to the death and all his people. But nowe the sayd voyage and trade is greatly aduaunced, & the Marchants aduenturing that way are newly by act of parliament incorporated & endued with sundry priuileges and liberties.

About the beginning of the Moneth of May next folowing there were three notable mariages concluded, & shortly after solempnized at Durham place. The first was betwene the Lorde Guilford Dudley, the fourth sonne of the Duke of Northumberland, & the Ladie Jane eldest daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolk and the Ladie Fraunces his wife, who was the daughter of Mary second sister to king Henry the eight, first maried to Lewys ỹ French king, & after to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke. The second mariage, was betwene the Lorde Harbert sonne and heyre of William Erle of Pembroke, and the Ladie Katherin second daughter of the said Lady Fraunces by the sayd Henry Duke of Suffolk. And the third was betwene Henry Lord Hastings, sonne and heyre of Fraunces Erle of Huntingdon, and Katheryn yongest daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which three mariages were compassed and concluded chiefly vpon purpose to chaunge and alter the order of succession to the crowne, made in the time of king Henry the eight, from the said kings daughters, Mary, & Elizabeth, and to conuey the same immediately after the death of king Edward to the house of Suffolk in ỹ right of the said Lady Fraunces: wherin the said yong king was an earnest trauailer in the time of his sickenesse, and al for feare that if his sister Mary being next heyre to the crowne, should succede, that she would subuert all hys lawes and statutes made concerning religion, wherof he was most carefull: For the continuance whereof he sought to establish a meete order of succession by the allyaunce of great houses by way of maryage, which neuertheless were of no force to serue his purpose. For tending to the diuersion of the rightful heires they proued nothing prosperous to the parties, for two of them were sone after made frustrate, the one by death, the other by deuorce.

In this meane while the king became euery day sicker then other of a cõsumption in his lunges, so as there was no hope of his recouery, wher vpon those that then bare chiefe auctority in counsail, w other Prelates & nobles of the realme, calling to them diuers notable persons learned, aswel in diuinitie as in the lawes of the land, namely, Bishops, Iudges, & other, fel to cõsultation vpon this weighty case, and lastly, concluded according to the deuice of king Edwards will, to declare the said Lady Jane eldest neece of king Henry the eight, and wife to the said Lord Guilford to be rightfull heyre in succession to the crowne of England without respect had to the statute made in the .xxxv. yere of king Henry the eight: The true meaning of which statute, they did impugne & ouerthrow by diuers subtile and sinister cõstructions of the same, to disenherite the said kings sisters to whom the succession of the crowne of England of right appertayned, aswell by the common lawes of this realme, as also by the said statute made in the said .xxxv. yere of the king, as aforesaide. To which newe order of succession all the sayd kinges counsail, with many Bishops, Lords, Doctors & Iudges of ỹ realme, subscribed their names wout refusal of any, except sir James Hales knight one of the Iustices of the cõmon place, who being called to this counsail would in no wise geue his assent either by word or writing, as ye shal here more in the history of Quene Mary. Now when these matters were thus cõcluded, & after confirmed by a nũber of hands as aforesaid, then the noble prince king Edward ỹ first by long lingring sicknesse and a cõsumption of his lungs as aforesaid approched to his death, and departed out of this life the first day of July in the .vij. yere of his reigne, after he had reigned & nobly gouerned this realme .vj. yeres .v. moneths, & .viij. dayes.

The death of king Edward the first.

The prayer of king Edward the first at his death.

Lord God deliuer me out of this miserable and wretched life, and take me among thy chosen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done. Lord I commit my spirit to thee. Oh Lord thou knowest how happie it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy chosens sake, if it be thy will send me life & health that I may truly serue thee. Oh my Lord blesse thy people and saue thine inheritance. O Lord God, saue thy chosen people of England. O my Lord God defend this realme from Papistrie and maintaine thy true religion, that I and my people may prayse thy holy name. And therewithall he sayde I am faint, Lorde haue mercy vpon me and take my spirite, and so he yeelded vp to God his ghost the sixt day of July.

The Lady Jane proclaymed Quene.

Immediatly after the death of king Edward, the aforesayd Lady Jane was proclaymed Queene of this realme by the sound of trumpet, that is to say, the .ix. day of July, at which Proclamation were present the Lordes of the Counsail, the Maior of London with other.

The Ladie Mary a little before lyng at Honesdon in Hartfordshire hauyng intelligence of the state of the king her brother, and of the secrete practise against her, by the aduice of her friendes with all speede tooke her iourney towarde her house of Kenninghall in Norffolke, entendyng there to remaine vntill she coulde make her selfe more strong of her friendes and allies: neuertheless vnderstanding by them that she could not lie there in surety, being a place open and easie to be approched, remoued from thence vnto her Castell of Fremingham standing in a wood Countrie, and not so easie to be inuaded by her enemies.

The Lady Mary flieth into Suffolke.

So soone as the Counsaile heard of her sodaine departure, and considering that all came not to passe as they supposed. They caused spedily a power of men to be gathered together. And first they agreed that the Duke of Suffolke, father to the newe made Queene, should haue the conduction and leading of that army. But afterwards vpon further considerations it was deuised, that the Duke of Northumberland should haue the charge of this great enterprice, which Duke hauing commission from the whole counsaile, without mistrust of that which after foztuned, toke in hand that vnhappy voyage to his owne destruction as in the history of Queene Mary shall appere. So that setting apart the feare of all perils (which in other lesse cases he neuer vsed) when all things were in a redinesse he beyng accompanied with no small number of Lozdes and Gentlemen, set fozward on his iourney, passing to Cambridge, & from thence to S. Edmondsbury.

to

The Lady Mary beyng then at Fremyngham, heeryng of this preparation against her, gathered together such power of the noble men & other her friendes in that coũtry as she could get. And first of al the noble men ỳ came vnto her ayd, were the Erles of Sussex, Bath, and Oxford, the lozd Wentwozth, sir Thomas Cornewallis, sir Henry Jerningham, sir William Walgraue, with diuers other gentlemen & cõmons of the Coũties of Nozffolk, & Suffolk. In this meane season the Lozd Windsoze, sir Edmond Peckham, sir Robert Dzury, & sir Edward Hastings, rayled the commons of the shire of Buckingham, to whom resozted sir John Williams, which afterward was Lozd Williams of Tame, & sir Leonard Chamberleyn with the chiefe power of Oxfozdshire. And out of Nozthamptonshire came sir Thomas Trellham & a great number of gentlemen out of diuers parts whose names were to long to reherse. These capitaines wt their cõpanies beyng thus assembled in warlike maner marched fozward towards Nozffolk to the aid of ỳ Lady Mary, & the further they went, ỳ moze their power encreased.

The Lozds of the counsaile being in this meane while at London, after they vnderstood how the better part of the realme were enclined, & heryng euery day newes of great assemblies, began to suspect the sequele of this enterprice: so that prouiding foz their owne suretie without respect of the Duke (who was now at Bury) they fell to a new counsaile, and lastly, by assent made proclamation at Lõdon in the name of the Lady Mary, by the name of Mary Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland defender of the faith, and of the Churches of England and Ireland supreme head. Of which proclamation after the Duke of Nozthumberland beyng then at Bury was aduertised by letters from the counsaile, he incontinent according to a new order receyued from them, returned with his power again to Cambridge, & forthwith vpon his comming thether proclaymed the sayd Lady Mary Queene: which proclamation made a sodaine chaunge of mindes in his army, foz they that late befoze seemed most fozward in that quarel, began first to flie from him, and so euery man shifting foz himselfe, he that late befoze was furnished of such multitude of Souldiours, was sodeinly forsaken of all sauyng of a fewe whose perilles were ioyned with his.

Queene Mary.

MAry eldest daughter of king Henry the eight by the Lady Katheryn of Spain, his first wife, and sister vnto king Edward the first by the father side, began her reigne the first day of July, which day the king her bzother dyed, and she was proclaymed at London (as is befoze remembred in the ende of the history of king Edward the first) the .vi. day of July. 1553. And the .xviij. day of ỳ said month next folowing, was also proclamed in Cambridge by John Duke of Nozthumberlande, as is afoze mencioned, which proclamation tion made by the sayd Duke at Cambridge notwithstanding, for that he was appointed generall of the army in the quarel of the Lady Jane of Suffolk, he was by the Maior of Cambridge, & one sergeant at armes arrested of treason. And the .xxviij. day of the sayd Moneth he with John Erle of Warwike his eldest son and two other of his sonnes, & diuers other lords & gentlemen, namely William Marques of Northampton, Fraunces Erle of Huntingdon, sir John Gates capitaine of the gard to king Edward the first, Sir Thomas Palmer & other mo brought prisoners from Cambridge aforesayd by the Erle of Arondel, & so conueyed to the tower of London. And the .xvj. day of August next folowyng, the said Duke, & the other before named (the Erle of Huntingdon except) were brought into Westminster hall, & there arreigned of high treason before Thomas Duke of Norffolk high steward of England. And being brought to ỹ bar, he vsed great reuerence to his Judges, & protesting his faith and allegeance to the Queenes Maiesty, whom he confessed to haue grieuously offended, he sayde that he meant not to speake any thing in defence of his fact, but would vnderstand first the opinion of the Court in two poyntes.

The Duke of Northūberland arreigned.

1 The first, whether a man doyng any act or thing by auctority of the princes counsaile, & by warrant of the great Seale of England, and nothing doing without the same, may be charged with treason for doyng any thing by such warrant?

2 The second, whether any such persons as were equally culpable in that crime & those by whose letters & cōmaundements he was directed in all his doings, might be his iudges or passe vpon his trial as his peres?

Whereunto was aunswered: as to the first, that the great seale (which he laid for his warrant) was not the seale of ỹ lawfull Queene of the realme, nor passed by her auctority, but ỹ seale of an vsurper, & therfore could be no warrāt to him.

And to the second, that if any were as deply to be touched in the case as himselfe, yet so long as no atteyndor were of record against them, they were neuertheles persons able in law to passe vpō any trial, & not to be chalenged therfore, but at the princes pleasure. After which answere the duke vsing a few words, declaring his earnest repentance in the case, and mouing the duke of Norffolk to be his meane to the Quene for mercy, without further answere confessed the inditement, by whose example the other lords arreyned with him did in the like maner, & therevpon had iudgement: so that the .xxij. day of the sayd moneth of August, the sayd duke, sir John Gates, & sir Thomas Palmer, at the tower hill were executed, and all the rest shortly after were pardoned by the Queene who (as it was reported) could also haue bene content to haue spared the sayd dukes life as well as the rest, for the special fauor that before time she did alwayes beare vnto him.

After that Queene Marye was thus with full consent of the Nobles, and Commons of the realme proclaymed Queene she being then in Norffolke at her Castell of Framingham, repayred with all speede toward the Citie of London, & the third day of the said moneth of August she came to the said Citie, and so to the Tower. Where the Lady Jane of Suffolk late afore proclaymed Queene, with her husband the Lord Guilford a little before her comming, were committed to warde, and there remayned after almost fiue Monethes. And by the way as the Queene thus passed, she was ioyfully saluted of all the people without any misliking, sauyng that it was much feared of many, that she would alter the religion set forth in the time of king Edward her brother, wherof then were geuen iust occasions, because (notwithstandyng diuers lawes made to the contrary) shee had daylye Masse and Latine seruice sayde before her in the Tower.

The Lady Jane and the Lorde Guilforde imprisoned.

At her entrye into the Tower there were presented to her certaine prisoners, namely Thomas Duke of Norffolke attainted of treason by Parlyament in the last yeare of King Henry the eight, whose attayndor in the first Parliament of thys newe Queene for great causes was reuersed and made voyde boyde. Also Edward Courtney sonne and heire of Henrie Marques of Exceter Cosyn Germaine to king Henry the eyght, and Cutbert Tonstall Bysshop of Durham with other persons of great calling: But specially Stephen Gardyner Bysshop of Wynchester, whome shee not onely released of imprisonment, but also immediatly aduaunced and preferred to be Lorde Chauncelor of Englande, restoring him also to his former estate and Bysshoprick, and remoued from the same one Doctor Poynet, who a little before was placed therein by the gift of king Edwarde the sixt. And touching Edwarde Courtney, she not onely aduaunced him to the Erledome of Deuonshire, but also to so much of his fathers possession as there remayned in her handes, whereby it was then thought of many, that she bare affection to him by way of martage, but it came not so to passe (for what cause I cannot geue any reason) but surely the subiectes of Englande were most desirous thereof.

Stephyn Gardyner made Chancelour of England.

Edwarde Courtney made Erle of Deuonshire.

Upon the receauing of this newe Queene, all the Bysshops which had bene deprined in the time of king Edwarde the sixt her brother for the cause of religion, were nowe againe restored to their Bishoprickes. And such other as were placed in king Edwards time remoued from their Seas, and other of contrarie religion placed. Amongst whom Edmond Bonner Doctor of the lawes, late afore deprined from the Sea of London and committed prisoner to the Marshalsea by order of king Edwardes counsayle, was with all fauour restored to his libertie and Bishoprick, and Nicholas Ridley Doctor in Diuinitie late before aduaunced to the saide Sea by the sayd king was hastily displaced and committed prisoner to the Tower of London. The cause why such extremitie was vsed towarde the sayde Bishop Ridley more then to the rest, was for that in the time of the Ladie Jane he preached a Sermon at Paules crosse by the commaundement of king Edwardes Counsayle, wherein he dissuaded the people for sundrye causes from receyuing the Lady Marie as Queene.

Nicholas Ridley Bysshop of London.

Sone after the restitution of Doctor Bonner to hys Bishoprick he appointed one late a Chaplein of his called Doctor Bozne to preach at Paules Crosse, who was then promoted to the Queenes seruice, and not long afterward made Bishop of Bathe. The sayde Doctor taking occasion of the Gospell of that day, spake somewhat largely in the iustefiyng of Bishop Bonner beyng present at the Sermond, which Bishop (as the sayde Preacher then openly sayde) for a Sermon made vpon the same text and in the sayd place the same daye foure yeres afore passed, was most vniustly cast into the vile Dongeon of the Marshalsea among Theenes, and there kept during the time of king Edwardes reigne. This matter beyng set forth with great vehemency, so much offended ỹ eares of part of the audience, that they brake silence, and began to murmoure and thronge together, in such sorte as the Maior and Aldermen with other of the wiser sorte then present, feared much an vprore. During which muttering one more feruent then his fellowes, threwe a Dagger at the Preacher, but who it was, came not to knowlege. By reason of which outrage the Preacher withdrew himselfe from the Pulpet, and one Maister Bradford at the request of the Preachers brother and others, standing there, toke the place and spake so mildely to the people, that with few wordes he appeased their fury. And after the sayd Maister Bradforde and Maister Rogers although men of a contrarie religion conueied the sayde Preacher into Poules Schoole, and there left him in safetie.

The Garde appointed for the defence of the Preacher.

The next Sondaye following for feare of a like tumult or worse, order was taken that the Queenes Garde should be present in the place to defend the Preacher with weapon, wherevpon the wiser men perceyuing such a number of weapons, and that great peryll was not vnlike to ensue by such apparaunce of late not accustomed, woulde not be present at the Sermon: By reason whereof, there was lett a small auditory. Wherefore afterward there was a commaundement geuen by the Lord Maior, that the auncients of the companyes should be present at the next Sermon in theire liueries, and so they did, wherby all became quyet.

Thomas Cranmer Archebishop committed to the Tower.

Sone after this, Thomas Cranmer Archebishop of Cantorburye, and late before of king Edwardes prime counsayle, was committed to the Tower of London, beyng charged wyth Treason, not onely for geuing aduice to the disinheriting of Queene Marye, but also for ayding the Duke of Northumberland with certayne horsse and men against the Queene in the quarell of the Lady Jane of Suffolke.

The coronation of Queene Marie.

The last day of September next following, the Queene passed from the Tower through the Citie of London vnto Westminster. And the next day beyng the first of October, shee was crowned at Westminster by Stephyn Gardiner Bishop of Winchester (for the Archebishops of Cauntorbury and Yorke were then prisoners in the Tower) as before ye haue heard.

A lewde generall pardon.

At the time of whose coronation, there was published a generall pardon in her name beyng enterlaced with so many exceptions, as they that neded the same most, tooke smallest benefite thereby. In which pardon were excepted by name no small number, not onely of Bishoppes and other of the clergie, namely the Archebishops of Cauntorbury and Yorke, the Bishop of London, but also many Lordes, Knightes and Gentlemen of the layetie, beside the two chiefe Justices of England, called Sir Roger Cholmeley, and Sir Edward Mountagew, and some other learned men in the law, for counsayling, or at the least consenting to the depriuation of Queene Mary, and ayding of the aforesayde Duke of Northumberlande in the pretensed right of the aforenamed Lady Jane, the names of which persons so beyng excepted I haue omytted for shortnesse sake.

Commissioners at the Deane of Paules house.

Assone as this pardon was published, and the solempnitie of the feast of the coronation ended, there were certaine commissioners assigned to take order with all such persons as were excepted out of the pardon & others to compound with the Queene for their seuerall offences, which commissioners sate at the Deane of Paules house at the west ende of Paules Church, and there called before them the sayde persons apart, and from some they tooke their Fees and offices graunted before by king Edward the first, and yet neuertheless putting them to their fines, and some they committed to warde, deprining them of their states and lyuings, so that for the time to those that tasted therof, it seemed verie grieuous, God deliuer vs from incurring any suche daunger of law againe.

A parliament.

The fift day of October next folowing the Queene held her high court of parliament at Westminster which continued vntill the .xxj. day of the sayd Moneth. In the first Session of which parliament there passed no mo acts

but

but one, and that was to declare Queene Marie lawfull heyre in discent to the crowne of Englande by the common lawes next after her brother king Edwarde, and to repeale certayne cauſes of treaſon, felonye and Premunire conteyned in diuers former ſtatutes, the which act of repeale was for that Cardinall Poole was ſpecially looked for (as after yee ſhall heare) for the reducing of the Churche of Englande to the Popes obedience, and to the ende that the ſayde Cardinall, nowe called into Englande from Rome might holde his Courtes Legantine without the daunger of the ſtatute of the premunire made in that caſe, whereinto Cardinall Wolſey (when he was Legate) had incurred to his no ſmall loſſe, and to the charge of all the Clergie of Englande for exerciſing the lyke power. The which act beyng once paſſed, foorthwith the Queene repayred to the parliament houſe, & gaue therevnto her royall aſſent, and then prorogued the parliament vnto the. xxiij. daye of the ſayde Moneth, in which ſecond Seſſion were confirmed and made dyuers and ſundry eſtatutes concerning religion, whereof ſome were reſtored and other repealed.

Treaſon, Felonye, Premunire,

At this tyme many were in trouble for religion, and among other ſir James Hales knight one of the Juſtices of the common place, which Juſtice beyng called among other by the Counſaile of king Edwarde to ſubſcribe to a deuice made for the diſenherityng of Queene Mary, and the Lady Elizabeth her ſiſter, would in no wiſe aſſent to ỹ ſame, though moſt of the other did. Yet that notwithſtandyng, for that he at a quarter Seſſions holden in Kent gaue charge vpon the ſtatutes of king Henry the. viij. and king Edward the ſixt in derogation of the primacie of the Church of Rome abholiſhed by king Henry the eight, was firſt committed priſoner to the kinges Bench, then to the Counter, and laſt to the Fleete, where, whether it were through extreeme feare, or elſe by reaſon of ſuch talke as the Wardeyn of the Fleete vſed vnto him of more trouble like to enſue, if he perſiſted in hys opinion (or for what other cauſe God knoweth) he was ſo inwardly troubled and vexed, that he ſought to rid himſelfe out of this life, which thing he firſt attempted in the Fleete, by woundyng himſelfe with a Penknife, well nere to the death. Neuertheleſſe afterward beyng recouered of that hurt, he ſemed to be very conformable to all the Queenes procedynges, & was thervpon deliuered of his impriſonment, and brought to the Queenes preſence, who gaue him wordes of great comfort. Neuertheleſſe his minde was not quiet (as after well appered) for in the ende he drowned himſelfe in a riuer, not halfe a myle from his dwellyng houſe in Kent, the riuer beyng ſo ſhalow that he was faine to lye grouelyng before he could diſpatch himſelfe, whoſe death was much lamented. For beſyde that he was a man wiſe, vertuous, and learned in the lawes of the Realme, he was alſo a good and true miniſter of iuſtice, whereby he gate him great fauour and eſtimation among all degrees.

Sir James Hales troubled for religion.

Sir James Hales drowned himſelfe.

Duryng the aforeſayde Parliament, about the. xviij. day of October, there was kept at Paules Church in London a publike diſputation appointed by the Queenes commaundement, about the preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament of the Aulter, which diſputation continued fiue dayes, Doctor Weſton then beyng Prolocutor of the conuocation, who vſed many vnſemely cherkes ly checkes and tauntes agaynſt the one part, to the prꝛeiudice of their cauſe. By reaſon whereof the diſputers neuer reſolued vpon the artitles prꝛopo-ned, but grew daily moꝛe and moꝛe into contention, without any fruit of their long conference, and ſo ended this diſputation with theſe woꝛdes ſpoken by Doctor Weſton Prꝛolocutoꝛ, it is not the Queenes pleaſure that we ſhould ſpend herein any longer time, and ye are wel ynough, foꝛ you haue the woꝛd, and we haue the ſwoꝛde. But of this matter ye may read moꝛe in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

Cardinall Poole ſent foꝛ to Rome.

At this time was Cardinall Poole ſent foꝛ to Rome by the Queene who was very deſirous of his comming, alwel foꝛ the cauſes befoꝛe declared as alſo foꝛ the great affection that ſhe had to him being her nere kinſman and conſentyng with her in religion. This meſſage was moſt thankefully recey-ued at Rome, and oꝛder taken to ſende the ſayd Cardinall hether with great expedicion. But befoꝛe his commyng, Queene Mary had maryed Philip Prꝛince of Spaine, as after ſhall appere.

The Counſayle deuiſed foꝛ the receaꝛ-ming of the Cardinall.

But here to touche ſomewhat of the commyng of the ſayde Cardinall, when he was arriued at Calice, there was a conference had amongeſt the Counſaloꝛs of the Queene foꝛ ỹ maner of his receiuing. Some would haue had him very honoꝛably met and enterteyned, as he was in all places where he had befoꝛe paſſed, not only foꝛ that he was a Cardinall and a Legate from the Pope, but alſo foꝛ that he was the Queenes nere kinſman of the houſe of Clarence. Neuertheleſſe, after much debatyng, it was thought meeteſt, firſt foꝛ that by the lawes of the realme (which yet were not repealed) he ſtoode attainted by Parliament: And alſo foꝛ that it was doubtfull howe he beyng ſent from Rome ſhould be accepted of the people, who in.xxv. yeres befoꝛe had not bene much acquainted with the Pope oꝛ his Cardinalles: that theꝛ-foꝛe vntill all thinges might be put in oꝛder foꝛ that purpoſe, he ſhould come without any great ſolempnitie vnto Lambith, where in the Archebiſhoppes houſe his lodgyng was prꝛepared.

Thomas Cranmer. The Lady Jane of Suffolke. The Lorde Guylfoꝛd.

In November next folowyng, Thomas Cranmer Archbiſhop of Can-toꝛbury, notwithſtandyng that he had once plainly refuſed to ſubſcribe to king Edwardes will in the diſinherityng of hys ſiſter Mary (allegyng ma-ny reaſons and argumentes foꝛ the legittimation of both the kinges ſiſters) was in the Guyldhall in London arreigned and attainted of treaſon, namely foꝛ aidyng the Duke of Noꝛthumberlande with hoꝛſe and men agaynſt the Queene as afoꝛeſayde. And the ſame tyme alſo the Ladie Jane of Suffolke (who foꝛ a while was called Quene Jane) and the Loꝛd Guyldfoꝛd her huſ-band were in like maner arreigned and attainted, and then againe returned to the Tower, from whence they neuer came but to the Scaffold.

An Ambaſ-ſade ſent from the Emperour.

In the beginnyng of January next folowing, Charles the fift Emperoꝛ, ſent into England an honoꝛable Ambaſſade, among whom was Countye Ayguemont, and many other noble men, with full commiſſion to conclude a marꝛage betweene Philip the prꝛince of Spaine his ſonne and heyꝛe, and Queene Mary as you haue heard: which Ambaſſade tooke ſuch place that ſhoꝛtly after all thinges were finiſhed accoꝛdyngly. But this mariage was not well thought of by the Commons, noꝛ much better liked of many of the Nobilitie, who foꝛ this, and foꝛ the cauſe of religion, conſpired to rayſe waꝛ rather then to ſee ſuch chaunge of the ſtate. Of the which conſpiracie though there there were many confederats, yet the firſt that ſhewed forre therin, was one ſir Thomas Wyat a knight in Kent, who by open Proclamations publiſhed there that the Queene and her Counſaile woulde by this forreyne marryage bring this realme into moſt miſerable ſeruitude and bondage of ſtraungers. Rebellion in Kent.

The .xxv. day of January next folowyng newes were brought to the Court of this ſturre begon by the ſayde Sir Thomas Wyat. And forthwith after this it was knowne that Henry Duke of Suffolke father to the Ladie Jane (which Ladie Jane was yet alive) was ſodainely departed from the Court with his two brethren into Warwikeſhire, and Leyceſterſhire, there to rayſe and gather a power of thoſe Countries to ioyne with Sir Thomas Wyat. The Queene hearing of theſe tumults did firſt by her proclamation declare the ſaide Duke of Suffolke, and ſyr Thomas Wyat with other Traitors. And forthwith ſhee ſent into the Citie of London for fyre hundred men, which becauſe they ware whyte Coates, on their armors were called the white Coates of London. Theſe white Coates with certaine vntruſtie Capitaines were ſent into Kent vnder the conduction of Thomas Duke of Norffolke, for whoſe better ſuretie the Queene had aſſigned certaine of her Garde to attende, which in great haſte ſet forwarde, and hauing marched almoſt to Rocheſter, Wyat with all his companye beyng in the towne, the ſayde Capitaines with the white Coates, ſodaynlye reuolted from the ſaide Duke, and went ſtraight to the aide of Wyat, wherby the ſaide noble Duke beyng thus forſaken by his vnfaithfull felowſhip, was forced to retourne againe to London, and ſo to the Courte wythout any effect of his iourney: which repulſe vnto him being then an aged man, and fortunate before in all warres, imprelled ſuch dolour of minde, that he lyued but ſhort while after. Sir Thomas Wyat knight. The Duke of Suffolke and ſir Thomas Wyat proclaymed traytors. Thomas Duke of Norffolke ſent againſt ſir Thomas Wyat.

In this meane time as before you haue heard, the Duke of Suffolke beyng come from London into Leyceſterſhire, and Warwikeſhire with a very ſmall company (as the ſaiyng was) tooke vpon him there to publiſhe a Proclamation in his daughters name, purpoſing therby to haue perſwaded the ſubiectes, that Queene Marie entended to tourne the ſucceſſion, of the Crowne of Englande vnto ſtraungers, namely vnto Spanyardes, which Proclamation notwithſtanding, the people kept themſelues quiet. Queene Mary vnderſtanding of this, ſent Fraunces Erle of Huntyngdon to rayſe power in thoſe partes to withſtande the ſayde Duke, the which Erle ſped his time ſo well that he preuented the ſayde Duke from entring the Citie of Couentrie, where he had great hope of ayde among the common ſort: By reaſon whereof, hee being nowe diſappointed of his enterpriſe, with his two brethren, the Lorde Thomas and the Lorde John Graye fledde from thence to a Manor of his called Aſtley fyre miles from Couentry, and committed himſelfe to a man of his being keeper of his parke, called Nicholas Laurence, the which keeper beſtowed the Duke his Maiſter in a hollow Oke within the ſaide parke, where he remained two or three dayes vndiſcouered, vntill the ſayde keeper (as it is ſaide) diſcloſed his caſe to the ſayde Erle, who immediatly apprehended the ſaide Duke, and brought him priſoner to the Tower of London. Henry Duke of Suffolke apprehended.

After that ſyr Thomas Wyat had preuailed againſt the Duke of Norffolke, as is aforeſaide, and had encreaſed his number with the fyre hundred white coates with their Capitaines and other of the Queenes Gard, being well encouraged, aduaunced forward with his people the first of Februarie towards the Citie of London, where he trusted to haue founde great aide and succour, which came not so to passe.

The Ambassadors flie for feare of Wyat

The Emperors Ambassadors, of whome ye haue heard before, heering of Wyattes hastie approching to London sped themselues away by water, and that with all haste. The Queene then lying at her Palace of white Hall beside Westminster, and heering of her enemies so nere, was counsayled for her safegarde to take the Tower of London, whereunto she would by no meanes be perswaded: Neuertheless to make her selfe more stronger of friendes in the Citie, so sone as the sayd Ambassadors were departed (which was the first day of Februarye) shee came to Guyldhall in London, against which time, order was taken by the Lorde Maior that the chiefe Citezens in their Liueries should be there present. After the Queene had taken her place in the sayde Hall and silence made, she with very good countenaunce vttered in effect vnto them this Oration following.

Queene Maries oration.

I am (quod she) come vnto you in mine owne persone to tell you that which alredy you do see and knowe, that is how trayterously and seditiously a number of Kentishe rebelles haue assembled themselues against both vs and you: Their pretence (as they sayed at the first) was onely to resist a marryage determined betweene vs and the Prince of Spaine. To the which pretensed quarell and to all the rest of their euill contryued articles ye haue bene made priuie. Sithence which time, we haue caused dyuers of our priuy counsayle to resorte ertsones to the sayde rebelles, and to demaunde the cause of this their continuaunce in their seditious enterprise: By whose answeres made again to our said counsail, it appered that the mariage is founden to be the least of their quarell, for they now swaruing from their former Articles, haue bewrayed the inward treason of their heartes, as most arrogantly demaunding the possession of our person: the keping of our Tower: And not onely the plasing and displasing of our counsaylors, but also to vse them and vs at their pleasures. Now louing Subiectes, what I am ye right well know, I am your Queene, to whome at my coronation when I was wedded to the realme and to the lawes of the same (the spousall ring whereof I haue on my finger, which neuer hetherto was, nor hereafter shall be left of) ye promised your allegeaunce and obedience vnto mee, and that I am the right and true inheritor to the crowne of this realme of Englande, I not onely take all Christendome to witnesse, but also your actes of parliament confirming the same. My father (as ye all knowe) possessed the regall estate by right of inheritance, which now by the same right dissended vnto me. And to him alwayes ye shewed your selues most faythfull and louing subiectes, and him obeyed and serued as your liege Lorde and king, and therefore I doubt not but you will shew your selues likewise to me his daughter, which if ye do, then may you not suffer any Rebell to vsurpe the gouernaunce of our person, or to occupie our estate, especially beyng so presumpteous a Traytor as this Wyat hath shewed himselfe to be, who most certainly as he hath abused mine ignorant Subietes to be adherentes to his trayterous quarell, so doth he intende by colour of the same to subdue the lawes to his will, and to geue skope to all rashall and forlorne persones to make generall hauock and spoyle spoyle of your goodes. And this farther I saye vnto you in the worde of a Prince, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loueth her childe, for I was neuer the mother of any: But certainely if a Prince and gouernor maye as naturally and as ernestly loue subiectes as the mother doth the childe, then assure your selues, that I being your souerigne Lady and Queene do as ernestly and as tenderly loue & fauor you. And I thus louing you cannot but thinke that ye as heartily and faithfully loue me againe: And so ioyning together in this knot of loue and concorde, I doubt not but we together shall be well hable to geue these rebellions a short and speedy ouerthrow. And as concerning the cause of my entended mariage, against which they pretende their quarell, ye shall vnderstand that I entred not into the treatie thereof without aduice, of all our Prime Counsayle, yea and by assent of those, to whome the king my father committed his trust, who so considered and weyed the great comodities that might ensue therof, that they not onely thought it very honorable, but also expedient both for the wealth of our realme, and also of all you our louing subiects. And as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so desirous of wedding, neyther so precise or wedded to my wyll, that either for mine owne pleasure I will chose where I lust, or else so amorous as needes I must haue one, for God I thanke him (to whome be the prayse thereof) I haue hetherto lined a Virgin, and doubt nothing but with Godes grace shall as well be hable so to liue styll. But if as my progenitors haue done before, it might please God that I might leaue some fruite of my bodie behinde me to be your Gouernor, I trust you would not onely reioyce therat, but also I know it would be to your great comforte. And certainly, if I either did know or thinke that this mariage should either turne to the daunger or losse of any of you my louing subiectes, or to the detriment or empayring of any parte or parcell of the royall state of this realme of Englande, I would neuer consent therevnto, neyther would I euer marry while I lyued. And in the worde of a Queene I promise and assure you, that if it shal not probably appere before the nobilitie and commons in the high court of parliament that this mariage shalbe for the singuler benifite and commodity of all the whole realme, that then I wyll abstaine not onely from this mariage, but also from any other whereof perill may ensue to this noble realme. Wherfore now as good and faythfull subiectes plucke vp your heartes, and like true men stande fast with your lawfull prince against these rebelles, both our enemies and youres, and feare them not, for I assure you, that I feare them nothing at all, and I will leaue with you my Lorde Hawarde and my Lorde Treasorer to be assistentes with my Lorde Maior for the defence and safegarde of the Citie from spoyle and sacrage, which is the onely hope of this rebellious company.

After this oration ended, and the Citezens seeming well satisfied therewith, the Queene with the Lordes of the counsaile returned to Whitehall from whence she came. And forthwith the Lorde William Hawarde was associate with the Lord Maior of London, whose name was Sir Thomas White, for the protection and defence of the Citie. And for more suretie, as well of her owne person, as also of her Counsaylors and good subiects, the sayde Queene prepared a great armie to meete with the sayde rebels in the fielde, of which armie William Erle of Pembrooke was made generall:

A generall pardon.

At this time also the Queene published a proclamation which conteyned a generall pardon to all them that would forsake Wyat and his adherentes and returne to her. And also in the same was promised an hundred pound lande a pere to him or them and to their heyres that could take Wyat prisoner and bring his body quick or dead to the Queene or her counsayle.

Wyat with his people placed them selues in Southwark

During this great preparation of defence, as well within the Citie of London by the Maior and his brethren, as also without by the Erle of Pembrooke appoynted Capitayne generall for the Queene, Wyat with his rebels drewe nere to the Citie and entred into Southwarke the thirde day of February, what time the Lorde Maior in great haste and no lesse good policy (whose soeuer the deuise was) caused the drawe bridge of London to be hewen downe and throwne into the Thames, for feare that some light hedded Citizens and other rascall people euer apt to rebellion should haue issued and ioyned in ayde of the sayde rebels.

Wyat taketh his iourney to Kingston.

After that Wyat with his complices had lyen two dayes in Southwarke, and sawe no possibility of entring into the Citye, he then altred his iourney, on the Tuesday next being Shrouetuesday, earely in the morning, he tooke his way to Kyngston vpon Thames, where he found a great part of the bridge broken, which neuertheles he caused to be made againe with such expedition as was maruaylous, so that he and all his companye with cartages and artillarie were passed ouer in safetie or any newes therof came to the Court. And with no lesse celeritie and speede marched forwardes the same night towardes London, which with such ayde as he hoped for there, he thought to haue surpryzed vpon the sodayne. Neuertheles before he came within fiue myles of the Citie, staying vpon a peece of his great artillary which was dismounted by the way: his comming was discouered before daye, whereby the Erle of Pembrooke beyng generall of the Queenes armie (as is aforesayde) was with hys men in good order of battayle in saint Iames field beside Westminster two or three houres before Wyat could reache thether: The Erle hauing vnderstanding by hys espialles what way Wyat would march, placed his armie in this order. First in a field on the West side of Saint Iames were all his men of armes and Demy Launces: ouer against whome in the Lane next to the Parke were placed all the light horsemen. All which bandes of horsemen were vnder the charge of the Lorde Clynton beyng Marshall of the fielde. The great Artillarye was planted in the middest and highest place of the Cawsey, leadyng from the Parke Corner towarde Charyng Crosse. The maine battaile where the Erle was with the Queenes standard in the field on the Northside of the sayde Cawsey. And the vaunt garde on the Southside of the Cawsey, next to the house of Saint Iames with certaine fielde peeces, lying on the flankes of eche battaile. After that both the armyes were in sight, and that the great artillary began to thunder from either syde, without harme (as it happened to any of both) Wiat perceiuing that he could not come the fore right way without great disaduauntage, when he was come to the Parke corner, he leauyng the Cawsey, swarued and tooke the nether way toward Saint Iames, which beyng perceyued by the Queenes

horsemen who lay on either syde of him, they gaue a sodaine charge, and deuided his battaile asunder hard behinde Wyats ensignes, whereby so many as were not passed before with Wyat, were forced to flye backe towardes Brainford, and certaine of his companie which escaped the charge passed by the backeside of Saint Iames towardes Westminster, and from thence to the Court, and findyng the Gates shut against them stayed there a whyle, and shot of many Arrowes into the Windowes, and ouer into the Gardeyn, neuertheless without any hurt there that was knowne: Wherupon the sayd Rebelles ouer whome one Knyuet was Capitaine perceiuyng themselues to be to fewe to do any great feate there, departed from thence to followe Wyat who was gone before towardes London. And beyng on theyr way at Charyng Crosse, were there encountered by sir Henry Jerningham Capitaine of the Queenes Gard, Sir Edward Bray Master of the ordinance, and Sir Philip Parys knightes, which were sent by the order of the Erle of Pembroke with a bande of Archers, and certaine fielde peeces for the reskue of the Court, who encountered the sayde rebelles at Charyng Crosse aforesayde. After they had discharged the fielde peeces vpon them, ioyned with those rebelles halfe armed, and halfe vnarmed at the push of the Pyke, and very soone dispersed their power, whereof some fled into the Lane towarde Saint Giles, and some on the other syde by a Brewhouse towardes the Thamys. In this conflict which was the chiefe tryall of that day, there was not found slaine to the number of .xx. of those rebelles, which happened by reason that vpon their ioynyng with the Queenes Souldiors, the one part could not be discerned from the other, but onely by the myre & durt taken by the way, which stack vpon their garments cõmyng in the night, wherfore the cry on the Queenes part that day was, downe with the Waggle tayles.

A skirmish at Charing Crosse.

But nowe to returne to Wyat, of whome ye heard before, howe beyng come to the Parke corner, and perceiuyng the perill apparaunt if he should haue marched streight vpon the Erles battayles which were raunged on eyther side of the Cawsey, did therfore politiquely turne from the great Cawsey, marching along the wall of the house of saint James towards London, which could not haue bene without his no little losse of many of his traine, if those that had the charge on that side the field had bene as forward in seruice as the Erle with his battaile and the horsemen afore shewed themselues to be. Neuertheles Wyat folowing his purposed enterprice, which was to haue entred into Londõ, where he hoped of great aide, marched forwarde with the small company that was left him as farre as a common Inne called the Bell Sauage, nereto Ludgate, beleuing to haue found some readie there to haue receyued him, wherein his hope was much deceyued, findyng the sayd gate fast shut, and strongly garded with a number aswell of most honest Citizens, as also of other bandes of the Queenes assured friendes: Wherevpon Wyat who comming towards the Citie made himselfe sure of his enterprice, nowe desperate of the same, was faine to turne hys face, retyring backe againe to Temple barre, where he with the rest of his retinue determined (as it seemed) to trie their last fortune.

The Erle of Pembroke who all this while kept his force together in the field, heryng of Wyats approch to Londõ, sent to him an Herault called Clarenseaux, with great commination to desyst from hys rebellious enterprice:

which Herault did his Meſſage accordyngly. Albeit that ſome ſayde he promiſed the ſayde Wyat his pardon, which ſhould not ſeeme to be true, aſwell for that the Herault had no ſuch commiſſion, as alſo that it was not lyke that the ſayde Wyat beyng then diſarmed of all his forces woulde haue refuſed mercy in ſuch a caſe. For true it is, that he with a very few of his forlorne fellowſhip, not many aboue the number of one hundred perſons, ſtoode ſtill as men amaſed in ỳ gate of Temple barre, till ſuch tyme as ſir Maurice Barkley knight, by chaunce ridyng towardes London vpon his horſe with footecloth, without any armour, findyng the ſayd Wyat there, perſwaded hym to repayre to the Court, and to yelde himſelfe vnto the Queene, whoſe aduice he followed, and incontinent mounted vp on the ſayde ſir Maurice horſe behynde him, and ſo roade to the Court voluntarily, and not forced by any to yelde himſelfe priſoner. This commyng of Wyat to the Court beyng ſo little looked for, was great cauſe of reioyce to ſuch as late before ſtood in great feare of him.

Sir Thomas Wyat ſubmitteth himſelfe to the Queene.

But more then marueile it was to ſee that day the inuincible heart and conſtancie of the Queene her ſelfe, who beyng by nature a woman, and therfore commonly more fearefull then men be, ſhewed her ſelfe in that caſe more ſtoute then is credible. For ſhe notwithſtandyng all the fearefull newes that were brought to her that day, neuer abaſhed, inſomuch that when one or two noble men beyng her Capitaynes, came with all haſt to tell her (though vntruely) that her battayles were yelded to Wyat: ſhe nothing moued therewith ſayde, it was your fond opinion that durſt not come nere to ſee the tryal: ſayeng farther, that ſhe her ſelfe would enter the field to trye the truth of her quarell, and to die with them that would ſerue her, rather then to yelde one iote vnto ſuch a traytor as Wyat, and prepared her ſelfe accordingly. But by the apprehenſion of Wyat, that voyage tooke none effect, for after his commyng to the Court, he was immediately committed to the Tower.

The great ſtomach and courage of Queene Mary.

Aſſone as the taking of Wyat was knowne, the armie whereof mencion is made before that lay in ſaint James field were diſcharged, and euerie man licenced to depart to his home. And foorthwith proclamation was made, as wel in the Citie of London as in the ſuburbs of the ſame, that none vpon paine of death ſhould keepe in his or their houſes any of Wyats faction, but ſhould bring them foorth immediatly before the Lord Maior and other the Queenes Juſtices. By reaſon of which proclamation, a great multitude of the ſayde poore Captifes were brought foorth, beyng ſo many in number, that all the priſons in London ſufficed not to receiue them, ſo that for lacke of place they were faine to beſtowe them in diuers Churches of the ſayde Citie. And ſhortly after were ſet vp in London for a terror to the common ſort, becauſe the white coates beyng ſent out of the Citie (as before ye haue heard) reuoked from the Queenes part to the ayde of Wyat, twentie payre of gallowes, on the which were executed in ſeuerall places to the number of fiftie perſons, which Gallowelles remayned ſtanding there a great part of the Sommer next folowyng, to the great griefe of good citezens, and for example to the commocioners.

The armie that lay in ſaint James fields diſcharged.

The. xij. day of Februarie next folowyng the Lady Jane of Suffolke and the Lorde Guylforde her husband who before (as you haue heard) were attaynted of Treaſon, the one for the vſurpation of the eſtate royall as Queene, the other as a principall adherent to her in that case, according to the iudgement geuen agaynst them suffered execution of death, that is to wyt, he at the Tower hill vpon the Scaffolde, and shee within the Tower, whose deaths were ꝑ rather hastened, for that the Duke (of Suffolk father to this Ladie, had of late (as ye haue heard) reysed a newe sturre and commotion in his Countrie, making proclamation in the name of his daughter as Queene, which was the shortening of her life, who else was lyke ynough to haue bene pardoned. This gentle yong Ladie endued with singuler giftis both of learning and knowledge as patyent and mylde as any Lambe came to the place of her execution. And a little before her death beyng vpon the Scaffolde vttered these wordes. and the Lord Guylford her husband.

The execution of the Lodie Jane of Suffolke,

Queene,

Good people I am come hether to die, and by a lawe I am condempned to the same. My offence agaynst the Queenes highnesse was onely in consent to the deuise of other, which now is deemed Treason, but it was neuer of my seeking, but by counsayle of those who should seeme to haue further vnderstanding of thinges then I, which knewe little of the lawe, and muche lesse of titles to the crowne: But touching the procurement and desire thereof by me or on my behalfe, I doe washe my handes in innocency thereof before God, and the face of all you (good christian people) this day, and therewith she wrong her handes, wherein she had her booke. Then sayde shee I pray you all good christian people, to beare me witnesse, that I die a true christian woman, & that I looke to be saued by none other meanes, but only by the mercie of God in the bloud of his onely sonne Iesus Christ. And I confesse that when I did knowe the worde of God, I neglected the same, and loued my selfe and the worlde, and therfore this plague and punishment is iustly and worthily happened vnto mee for my sinnes. And yet I thanke God of his goodnesse that he hath geuen mee a tyme and respite to repent. And nowe good people while I am a liue, I praye you assist me with your prayers. And then kneeling downe she said the Psalme of (Miserere mei deus) in English, and then stood vp and gaue her mayden (called mystresse Elyn) her Gloues and Hankerchefe, and her booke shee gaue to mayster Bruges then Lieutenaunt of the Tower, and so vntyed her Gowne, and the executioner preased to helpe her of with it, but she desired him to let her alone, and turned her towardes her two Gentlewomen, who helped her of therwith, & with her other attyres, and they gaue her a fayre Handkercheefe to put about her eyes. Then the executioner kneeled downe and asked her forgeuenesse: whome she forgaue most willingly. Then he willed her to stande vpon the strawe, which done shee sawe the block, and then she sayde I praye you dispatche me quickly. Then she kneeled downe saying, will you take it of before I laye me downe? whervnto the executioner aunswered, no Madame, then tyed she the Handkercheefe about her eyes, and feeling for the block she sayd, where is it, where is it? One of the standers by guyded her therevnto, and shee layde downe her head vpon the block, and then stretched foorth her bodie, and sayde. Lorde into thy hands I commend my spirite, and so finished her life in the yere of our Lorde. 1553. the .xij. day of Februarie. The wordes of the Ladie Iane at her death.

The same daye a litle before this young Ladyes execution, the Lorde Guilforde her housoande who was a very comely tall Gentleman, was executed on the Skaffolde at the Tower hill, as aforesayd, whose dead Carkas liyng in a Carre in ſtrawe, was againe brought into the Tower, at the ſame inſtant that the Ladie Jane his wife went to her death within the Tower, which miſerable ſight was to her a double ſorow & griefe. Thus theſe two ſimple yong ſoules ſuffered ignorantly for that, which their parentes & other had vnhappily brought about to the vtter ſubuerſiō of them & their families.

Henry Duke of Suffolke arreigned and executed.

The. xviij. day of Februarie next folowyng, Henry Duke of Suffolke father to the aforeſayde Lady Jane was arreigned at Weſtminſter and condempned of high treaſon, and the. xxj. day of the ſame Moneth, was behedded at the Tower hill. At the tyme of whoſe condempnation, were alſo for the ſame conſpiracie condempned many Gentlemen and Yomen, whereof ſome were executed at London, & ſome in diuers other places of the realme.

The Lorde Thomas Grey executed.

And among other, the Lorde Thomas Gray brother to the Duke beyng taken in Northwales was brought to London and there executed.

The. xviij. day of the ſame Moneth, there were brought out of the Tower, Marſhalſea, kinges Benche, and other priſones of the Kentiſhe rebels, and ſuch as were of Wyats faction to the number of foure hundred priſoners, with halters about their neckes to Weſtminſter, where the Queenes pardon was declared vnto them, which they ioyfully receiued, & yelded moſt humble thankes to God and the Queene, and ſo were diſcharged.

The Kentiſh Rebelles pardoned.

The. xv. day of March next folowing, the Lady Elizabeth the Queenes ſiſter, and next heire to the Crowne, was apprehēded at her Manor of Aſhridge for ſuſpicion of Wyattes conſpiracie, and from thence being that tyme very ſicke, was with great rygor brought priſoner to London, & ſhortly after committed to the Tower, where alſo the Lord Courtnay Erle of Deuonſhire (of whome before is made mention) was for the like ſuſpicion committed priſoner.

Lady Elizabeth.

And not long after Queene Marye partly offended with the Londoners, as fauourers of Wyattes conſpiracie, and partly perceiuyng the more part of them nothing well inclyned towardes her proceedynges in religion, which turned many of them to loſſe, ſommoned a Parliament to bee holden at Oxford, as it were to gratifie that Citie, which with the Vniuerſitie, towne, and Countrie, had ſhewed themſelues very forward in her ſeruice, but ſpecially in reſtoryng of the religion called Catholique. For which appoynted Parliament there to be holden, great prouiſion was made, aſwell by the Queenes Officers, as by the townes men, & inhabitaunts of the coūtrey round about. But the Queenes mynde in ſhort ſpace chaunged, and the ſame Parliament was holden at Weſtminſter in Aprill next folowyng, wherein the Queene propoſed two ſpeciall matters: the one for the maryage to be had betweene her & prince Philip of Spaine: the other for the reſtoryng againe of the Popes power and iuriſdiction in England. As touchyng her maryage, it was with no great difficultie agreed vpon, but the other requeſt could not be ſo eaſily obteyned.

A Parliamēt ſommoned to be kept at Oxford.

Thomas Cranmer, Hugh Latimer, and Nicholas Ridley, ſent as priſoners to Oxford.

The. x. day of Aprill folowyng, Thomas Cranmer Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, Nicholas Ridley late Biſhop of London, and Hugh Latimer once Biſhop of Worceſter, who had bene long priſoners in the Tower, were nowe conueyed from thence, and caryed to Windſore, and afterward to the Vniuerſitie of Oxforde, there to diſpute with the Deuines and learned men of the contrary opinion. Two dayes after their commyng vnto Oxford, which which was the .xij. day of the sayde Moneth, diuers learned men of both the Conuocatiõ Vniuersities were sent in commission from the conuocation (which duryng this Parliament was kept in Paules Churche in London) to dispute with those prisoners in certaine articles of religion. The names of them that were in Commission were these folowyng.

Commissioners.

Oxford	Doctor Weston Prolocutor,	Cambridge	Young,
	Cole,		Seton,
	Chedsey,		Watson,
	Pye,		Atkynson,
	Harpesfield,		Therknam,
	Smith,		Sedgewicke,

The .xiij. day of April, these disputers assembled themselues in saint Maryes Church to conuent the three persons aboue named, vpon certaine articles of religion, who being brought out of prison before them, were seuerally one after another examined of their opinions, vpon the articles proponed vnto them, whereof ye may reade in the booke of Monumentes of the Church more at large, and there finde the whole proceedyng in that matter.

Sir Thomas Wyatte of whome mencion is made before, was aboute Sir Thomas Wyat arreigned.
this time brought from the Tower vnto Westminster, and there arreigned of high treason: The Erle of Sussex, Sir Edwarde Hastinges and Sir Thomas Cornewallys with other beyng his Iudges. The effect of whose Indictment among other thinges specially was, that he the .xiiij. day of February last before, with force of armed multitude and Ensignes displayed, had at Brainford raised open war against our souereigne Lady the Queene traiterously pretending and practising to deprine her of her crowne and dignitie. And the question was demaunded of him, whether he was gyltie or no? whereat he stayed, and besought the Iudges that he might first aske a question before he answered directly to the poynte. And he was licensed so to do. The question was, that if he should confesse himselfe guilty whether the same should not be preiudictall vnto him, so as he by that confession shoulde be barred from vttering of such thinges as he had more to say. Wherevnto it was answered by the Courte, Maister Wyatte (sayde they) ye shall haue both leaue and leysure to say what you can. Then my Lordes (quoth he) I must confesse my selfe guilty, as in the end the truth of my case must enforce me, I must acknowlege this to be a iust plague for my synnes, which most grieuously I therfore haue committed against God, who suffred me thus brutely & beastly to fall into this horrible offence of the law. Wherfore all you Lordes & Gentlemen with other here present, note well my wordes. Lo here & se in me the same end which all other comonly had, which haue attempted like enterprice from the begynning. For peruse the Cronicles through, and you shall see that neuer rebellion attempted by subiectes against their prince and countrye from the begynning did euer prosper or had better successe, except the case of king Henry the fourth, who although he became a Prynce: yet in his act was but a Rebell, for so must I call him. And though he preuayled for a time, yet was it not long, but that his heires were deprined and those that had right againe restored to the kingdome and crowne, and the vsurpation so sharpely reuenged afterward in his bloud, as it well appered that the long delaye of Gods vengeaunce was supplyed with more grieuous plague in the

the third and fourth generation. For the loue of God all you Gentlemen that be here present, remember and be taught as well by examples past as also by this my present infelicity and most wretched case. Oh most miserable mischieuous, brutishe and beastly furyous imaginations of mine. I was perswaded that by the maryage of the Prince of Spaine, the seconde person of this realme, and next heyre to the crowne shoulde haue bene in daunger, and that I beyng a free borne man, should with my Country haue bene brought into the bondage and seruitude of Aliens and Straungers: which brutishe beastly opinion then seemed to me reason, & wrought in me such effectes, that it led me hedlong into the practise of this detestable crime of treason. But now beyng better perswaded, and vnderstanding the great commoditie and honor which the realme should receaue by this mariage, I stand firme and fast in this opinion, that if it shoulde please the Queene to be mercifull vnto me, there is no subiecte in this lande that shoulde more truely and faythfully serue her highnesse then I shall, nor no sooner dye at her graces feete in defence of her quarell. I serued her highnesse against the Duke of Northumberlande, as my Lorde of Arondell can witnesse. My Graundfather most truely serued her Maiesties Graundfather, and for his sake was vpon the racke in the Tower. My father likewise serued king Henry the eyght, to his good contentation, and I also serued him, and king Edward his sonne. And in witnesse of my blood spent in his seruice I carry a mayme. I allege not all this to set forth my seruice by way of merytе, which I confesse but dutie: But to declare to the whole worlde, that by abusing my wyttes in pursuyng my misaduised opinion, I haue not onely ouerthrowne my house, and defaced all the well doyngs of me and my auncestors (if euer there were any) but also haue bene the cause of mine owne death & destruction. Neither do I allege this to iustefie my selfe in any poynt, neither for an excuse of my offence, but most humbly submit my selfe vnto the Queenes maiesties mercy & pitie, desyring you my Lorde of Suffolk and you Maister Hastinges with all the rest of this honorable benche to be meanes to the Queenes highnesse for her mercye, which is the greatest treasure that maye be geuen to anye Prince from God, such a vertue as God hath appropriate to hym selfe, which if her highnesse vouchesafe to extend vnto me, she shall bestow it on him, who shall be most glad to serue truely, and not refuse to dye in her quarell: For I protest before the Judge of all Iudges I neuer ment hurt against her highnes person.

The queenes Attourney which was Maister Griffin.

Then sayde the Queenes attorney, maister Wyat ye haue great cause to be sory and repentaunt for your fault, wherby you haue not onely vndone your selfe and your house, but also a number of other Gentlemen, who beyng true men might haue serued their prince and Countrie: yet if you had gone no farther, it might haue bene borne withall the better. But beyng not so contented to staye your selfe, you haue so procured the Duke of Suffolke (a man soone trayned to your purpose) and his two brethren also, by meane whereof without the Queenes greater mercie, you haue ouerthrowne that Noble house. And yet not so stayed, your attempt hath reached as much as in you laye to the second person of the realme, in whome next to the Queenes highnesse resteth all our hope and comfort, whereby her honor is brought in question, and what daunger will folow, and to what ende it will come, God knoweth:

knoweth: Of all this you are the author.

Wyat answered as I will not in any thing iustify my selfe, so I beseech you I being in this wretched estate, not to overcharge me, or to make mee seeme to be that I am not. I am loth to touche any person by name, but that I haue written, I haue written. Wyattes answere.

Then sayde the Iudge, maister Wyat, maister Attorney hath well moued you to repent your offences, and we for our partes wish you the same. The Iudge.

Then sayde syr Edward Hastings maister of the Queenes horse, maister Wyat, doe ye remember, when I and mayster Cornewallys were sent vnto you from the Queenes highnesse to demaunde the cause of your enterprise, and what you required? were not these your demaundes, that the Queenes grace should go to the Tower and there remaine, and you to haue the rule of the Tower, & her person with the treasure in keeping. And such of her counsayle as you would require to be deliuered into your hands, saying that you would be trusted, and not trust? which wordes when Wyat had confessed. Then sayde the Queenes Solliciter, maister Wyat your presumption was ouer great, and your attempt in this case hath purchased you perpetuall infamy, and shall be called Wyats rebellion, as Watte Tylers was called Watte Tylers rebellion. Then sayd the Attorney maister Wyat, were you not priuie to a deuise wherby the Queene should haue bene murdered in a place, where she should walcke, I doe not burthen you to confesse this, for thus much I must saye on your behalfe, that you misliked that deuise? That (sayde Wyat) was the deuise of Wylliam Thomas, whom euer after I abhorred for that cause. Then was a letter shewed, which Wyat being in Southwarke had written to the Duke of Suffolke, that he should meete him at Kingston bridge, and from thence to accompanie him to London, although he came with the fewer number. Wyat at the first did not seme to remember any such letter, but when it was shewed him, he confessed his hande. Then was it demaunded of him among other things why he refused the Queenes pardon when it was offered him. My Lordes quoth he: I confesse my fault and offence to be most vile & heynous, for the which, first I aske God mercie, and next vnto him my souereigne liege Ladie and Queene, whome I haue most greeuously offended, appealing wholy to her mercie, without the which I cannot chalenge any thing, such is my offence alreadie committed. And therefore I beseech you to trouble me with no mo questions, for I haue deliuered all things vnto her grace in writing. And finally here I must confesse, that of all the voyages wherein I haue serued, this was the most desperate and painfull iournay euer I made. And where you asked why I did not receaue the Queenes pardon when it was offered vnto me, Oh vnhappie man what shall I saye? when I was once entered into this Deuilishe desperate aduenture, there was no waye, but to wade through with that I had taken in hande, for I had thought that other had bene as farre forward as my selfe, which I found farre otherwise: So that being bent to keepe promise with al my confederates, none kept promise with me: For I lyke a Moyle went through thick and thinne with this determination, that if I should come to any treaty, I should seeme to betray all my friendes. But whereto should I spende anye moe wordes? I yeelde my selfe wholy vnto the Queenes mercie, knowing well that it is onely in her This was maister Cordall nowe maister of the Rolles. William Thomas. The confession of Wyat.

power to make me(as I haue deserued)an open example to the world with Watte Tyler, or else to make me participant of that pittie which thee hath extended in as great crymes as mine, most humbly beseeching you all to be meanes for me to her highnesse for mercie, which is my last and only refuge. The will of God be done on mee. Upon this confession without further triall he receiued the iudgement accustomed in cases of Treason, which was to be hanged drawen and quartered. And the .xj. day of Aprill next following he was brought to the Tower hill, and there was pardoned of his drawing and hanging, but had his head striken of, & his body cut in foure quarters & set vp in diuers places about the City, & his hed was set vpon the Gallowes at Hay hill beside Hide parke. But here by the way is to be noted, that hee being on the Scaffold redie to suffer, he declared that the Ladie Elizabeth and Syr Edward Courtney Erle of Deuonshire whome he had accused before (as it seemed) were neuer priuie to his doings so farre as he knewe, or was able to charge them. And when Doctor Weston beyng then his confessor tolde him that he had confessed the contrarie vnto the counsayle: he answered thus, that I sayd then I sayd: But that which I say now, is true. This was the ende of Wyat and his conspiracie.

The execution of Sir Thomas Wyat.

Sir Nicholas Throkmorton.

The .xviij. daye of Aprill next following, Sir Nicholas Throkmorton knight was brought from the Tower to the Guildhall in London, and there arreigned of high treason as adherent and principall counsaylor to the sayd Wyat and the Duke of Suffolke and the rest, in the afore remembred conspiracie agaynst the Queene. But he so stoutly, and therwithall so cunningly answered for himselfe, as well in cleering of his cause, as also in defending & auoyding such poyntes of the lawes of the realme as were then alleged agaynst him, that the quest which passed vpon his life and death found him not guiltie, with which verdite the Iudges and counsayle there present were so much offended, that they bounde the Iury to appere at a daye in the starre Chamber before the Lordes: By whose awarde, some of them were committed to the Tower, and some other to the Fleete, where they lay vnto the .xiij. day of November next following, and could not be set at libertie vntill they had paide such fines as were taxed vpon them, which you may be sure were not small.

William Thomas arreigned and condempned.

William Thomas of whome mention is made before in the history of Sir Thomas Wyatte with certain other, were arreigned and condempned for the conspiring of the murder and killing of the Queene vpon the sodaine. And for that offence the sayd William was the .xviij. day of Maye drawne hanged and quartered at Tiborne.

The Ladie Elizabeth deliuered out of the Tower and sent as prisoner to Woodstock.

The .xix. day of Maye next following the Ladye Elizabeth Sister to Queene Mary was deliuered out of the Tower and committed to the custodie of Sir John Williams knight, afterward Lorde Williams of Tame, by whome her grace was more curteously entreated, then some woulde: wherefore shortely after she was committed to the Maner of Woodstocke vnder the custodye of sir Henry Benyngfielde of Oxenborough in the countie of Norffolke knight, at whose handes she found not the like curtesy: who (as it was well knowne) vsed his office more like a Gayler, then a Gentleman and with such rigor as was not meete to be shewed to such an estate. But here is to be noted not so much the vncivile nature of the man, as the singuler singuler lenitie and gracious clemency of that gentle and bertеous Prince, who afterward (as shall appere) comming to the possession of the crowne as her rightfull inheritaunce, was at that time so farre from reuenge of iniuries receyued, that where as diuerse princes haue requyted much lesse offences with losse of life, she neuer touched him, eyther with the daunger of life, eyther losse of landes or goodes, nor neuer proceeded further then to discharge him of the Courte, which many thought, was the thing that pleased him best. At whose departing from her presence, shee vsed onely these wordes or the like in sence, God forgeue you that is past and we doe, and if we haue any prisoner, whome we would haue hardly handled and straightly kept, then we will send for you.

Philyp and Mary by the grace of God king and Queene of England Fraunce, Naples, Ieruſalem and Ireland, defendours of the fayth, Princes of Spaine and Sicile, Archedukes of Auſtriche, Dukes of Milleyn, Burgondy and Brabant, Counties of Haſpurge, Flaundyrs and Tiroll.

The proclamation beyng ended, the Trumpets blew and the king and the Queene came forth of the Church hande in hande, and two swordes borne before them, and so returned to their Palace. And assoone as the feasting and solempnitie of the sayd mariage was ended, the king and Queene departed from Winchester, and taking Hampton Court in their waye, came from thence by water into Southwarke, and so ouer London bridge through the Citie of London vnto Westminster. At which time the Citie was bewtified with sumptuous pageauntes and hanged with riche and costly Silkes and cloth of golde and siluer.

The .xij. day of Nouember next following began a Parliament at Westminster, to the which the king and the Queene rode in their Parliament robes. During the tyme of this Parliament Cardinall Poole (of whome mencion is made before) arryued in England about the .xvij. day of the said Moneth, who beyng receyued with much honour in all other Countries that he had passed, was here in England receyued with no great shewe, for the causes afore declared. And shortly after he was restored by a speciall act of Parliament.

Cardinall Poole.

Parliament to his former estate and dignitie (whereof he was depriued by king Henry the eight.) After which acte passed, this Cardinall came into the Parliament house, beyng at that present kept in the great Chamber of the Court of Whitehall, for that the Queene by reason of sickenesse was not able to go abroade (where the king and Queene sittyng vnder the cloth of estate, and the Cardinall sittyng on the right hande, with all the other estates of the realme being present) and the knightes and Burgesses of the common house beyng also called thether, the Bishop of Winchester beyng Lorde Chauncelor spake in this maner.

The speech of the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chancelor.

My Lordes of the vpper house, and you my Maysters of the nether house, here is present the right reuerend father in God, my Lorde Cardinall Poole Legate a latere, come from the Apostolique sea of Rome, as Ambassador to the king and Queenes Maiesties, vpon one of the waightiest causes that euer happened in this realme, and which perteyneth to the glory of God and your vniuersall benefite. The which Ambassade their Maiesties pleasure is to be signified vnto you all by his alone mouth, trustyng that you will receyue and accept it in as benenolent and thankfull wise, as their highnesses haue done, and that you will geue attentiue and inclinable eares vnto his grace, who is nowe readie to declare the same.

So soone as the Lorde Chauncelor had ended his tale, the Cardinall began and made a long and solempne oration, the which for shortnesse sake I haue collected into these fewe articles.

The effect of the Cardinals Oration.

First, he yelded most heartie thankes to the King and Queene, and next vnto the whole Parliament, that of a man exiled and banished from this common weale, they had restored him agayne to bee a member of the same, and to the honor of his house and family. And of a man hauyng no place, neyther here nor elsewhere within the realme, to haue admitted him into place where to speake, and to be heard.

Secondly, that his speciall commyng was for the restitution of this Realme to the auncient estate, and to declare that the See Apostolique hath a speciall care of this realme aboue all other, and chiefly for that this Iland first of all other prouinces of Europe, receyued the light of Christes religion from the See of Rome.

Thirdly, he exhorted that though the realme had swarued from the Catholike vnitie, that yet beyng better informed we ought to returne into the bosome of the Church most openly receiue all penitentes. For the perswasion whereof, he brought a number of olde examples, what perill and hurte hath happened vnto them that haue swarued and gone from the Church of Rome, namely Greece and Germany, &c.

Fourthly, how much we are bounde to God for the King and Queenes Maiesties, and how miraculously God had saued and defended our Queene from her enemies in most dangerous times: And also that he hath prouided to ioyne with her in marriage, such a noble prince as king Philip was, and one of her owne religion.

Fiftly, he exhorted them all to the obedience of these two princes, and to call vpon God for aide to be had betweene them, addyng that king Philips subiect the Emperor had many other princes trauayled most, for the restitution of the peace and vnitie of the Church. But as almighty God sayd vnto

Dauid,

Dauid, though he had a minde and will to builde his Temple, yet becauſe he had ſhed bloud, he ſhould not build it, but his ſonne Salomon ſhould build it. And ſo becauſe the Emperour hath had ſo many warres, and ſhed ſo much bloud, therefore he could not attaine to bring perfect peace to the Church. But truely (ſayde he) this gracious prince king Philip his ſonne (as I conceyue) is appoynted of God to it, conſideryng now the callyng of him to bee ioyned with ſo Catholique a princes, as is the Queene of this realme, one without all doubt ſent likewiſe of God for the reſtoryng of the ſayde realme to the vnitie of the Church, from whence it hath erred and gone aſtray, as it doth and may manifeſtly appere.

Sirtly he proteſted that his Commiſſion was not to preiudice any perſon, for he came not to deſtroy, but to buylde: he came to reconcile, and not to condempne: he came not to compell, but to call againe: he came not to call any thing in queſtion all readie done: But his commiſſion was of grace and clemencie to all ſuch as would receyue it. For touchyng all matters paſt and done, they ſhould be caſt into the Sea of forgetfulneſſe, and neuer more to be thought vpon.

Finally (ſayde he) the meane whereby to receyue this high benefite, is firſt to reuoke and repeale all ſuch lawes as are impedimentes, blockes, and barres to this moſt gracious reconciliation. For lyke as he himſelfe had no place to ſpeake there, before ſuch lawes were abrogated and remoued as ſtoode in his way, euen ſo they could not receyue the grace offered from the Sea Apoſtolike, vntill thoſe like impedimentes of lawes made againſt the Sea of Rome were clerely abolished and repealed. And ſo in concluſion aduertiſed them, firſt for the glory of God, and next for the conſeruation and ſuretie of the welth and quietneſſe of the whole realme, that they ſhould earneſtly trauaile therein, and that then he would make them participant of the benefite of his commiſſion.

The next day, the whole Court of Parliament drewe out the forme of a ſupplication, and the next day folowyng that, the King and Queene, and the Cardinall with al the Nobles and Commons beyng aſſembled againe in the great Chamber of the white Hall aforeſayd. The Biſhop of Wincheſter there declared what the Parliament had determined concernyng the Cardinalles requeſt, and then offered to the king and Queene the ſayde ſupplication, the copie whereof foloweth.

A ſupplication exhibited to Cardinall Poole by the Parliament houſe.

WE the Lordes Spirituall and Temporal, and the Commons in this preſent Parliament aſſembled, repreſentyng the whole bodie of the realme of England, and dominions of the ſame, in the name of our ſelues perticulerly, and alſo of the ſayd bodie vniuerſally, offer this our moſt humble ſupplication to your Maieſties, to this ende and effect, that the ſame by your graces interceſſion and meane, may be exhibited to the moſt reuerend father in God, the Lord Cardinall Poole Legate, ſent ſpecially hether from our moſt holy father Pope Julio the thirde, and the ſea Apoſtolique of Rome, wherein we do declare our ſelues very ſory and repentant of the long Schiſme and diſobedience happening in this realme and the dominions of the ſame, againſt the ſayd Sea Apoſtolique, eyther by making, agreeing, or executing of any lawes, ordinances or commaundements againſt the primacy of the ſame Sea, or otherwiſe doyng or ſpeaking that might impugne or preiudice the same. Offering our selues and promising by this our supplication, that for a token & knowlege of our sayd repentance, we be and shall be euer readie vnder and with the authorities of your Maiesties, to the vttermost of our power, to do that shall lye in vs for the abrogation and repealyng of all the sayd lawes and ordinaunces made or enacted to the preiudice of the See Apostolique, aswell for our selues, as for the whole bodie whom we represent. Wherevpon most humbly we beseech your Maiesties, as personages vndefiled in offence of his bodie towardes the sayd See, which neuertheles God by his prouidence hath made subiect to you, so to set forth this our humble supte, as we the rather by your intercession maye obteyne from the See Apostolique by the sayde most reuerende father, aswell perticulerly as generally, Absolution, Releasle, and Discharge from all daungers of such Censures and sentences, as by the lawes of the Church we be fallen into. And that we may as childzen repentaunt, be receyued into the bosome and vnitie of Christes Church, so as this noble Realme, with all the members thereof, may in this vnitie and perfect obedience to the See Apostolique, and Popes for the tyme beyng, serue God and your Maiesties to the furtheraunce and aduauncement of his honour and glorie. Amen.

This supplication being first openly read, the same was by the Chauncelour delyuered to the king and Queene with petition to them to exhibite the same to the Lorde Cardinall. And the king and Queene rysing out of their seates and doyng reuerence to the Cardinall did delyuer the same vnto him. The Cardinall perceyuing the effect thereof to aunswere to his expectation, did receiue it most gladly at their maiesties handes. And then after that he had in fewe wordes geuen thankes vnto God, & declared what great cause he had to reioyce aboue all others, that his comming from Rome into Englande had taken suche most happie successe, then he caused his commission to be read (whereby it might appere that he had authoritie of the Pope to absolue them) which commission was verie long and large. And that beyng done and all the parliament on their knees, this Cardinall by the Popes authoritie gaue them Absolution in maner folowyng.

Our Lord Jesus Christ which with his most precious bloud hath redeemed and washed vs from all our sinnes & iniquities that he might purchase vnto himselfe a glorious spouse without spot or wrinkle, and whome the father hath appointed head ouer all his Church. He by his mercy absolue you: And we by the Apostolique authoritie geuen vnto vs by the most holy Lord Pope Julius the thirde (his Uicegerent in earth) doe absolue and delyuer you and euery of you with the whole realme and the dominions therof, from all heresie and Schisme, and from all and euery indgements, censures and paynes for that cause incurred. And also we doe restore you agayne to the vnitie of our mother the holy Church, as in our letters of commission more plainely shall appere. In the name of the father, the sonne, and holye ghost. Amen.

After this generall absolution receyued, the king and the Queene and all the Lordes with the rest went into the kings Chapell, and there sang Te deum with great ioy and gladnesse for this newe reconciliation.

The report of this with great speede flewe to Rome, as well by the French kinges letters, as also by the Cardinalles, wherevpon the Pope caused cauſed ſolempne Proceſſions to be made in Rome, namely one, wherein he himſelfe with all his Cardinalles were preſent, paſſyng with as great ſolempnitie & pompe as might be, geuyng thankes to God with great ioy, for the cõuerſion of England to his Church. At what time alſo he not a little cõmended the diligence of Cardinall Poole, and the deuocion of the king and Queene. And on Chriſtmaſſe euen next folowyng, he ſet forth by his Bulles, a generall pardon to all ſuch as did reioyce in the ſame reconciliation.

The. xxviij. of Nouember next folowyng, it was commonly reported, that the Queene was quicke with childe, and therefore commaundement was geuen by Edmond Bonner Biſhop of London (and as it was ſayd) not without the commaundement of the Counſaile, that there ſhould be made in moſt ſolempne maner one generall Proceſſion in Lõdon, wherin the Maior and all the companyes of the Citie were in their Lyueries. At whoſe returne to the Churche of Paules, there was ſong verye ſolempnly Te Deum for ioy thereof.

The ſecond day of December beyng Sonday, Cardinall Poole came to Paules Church in London with great pompe, hauyng borne before him a Croſſe, two Pillers, and two Pollares of ſiluer, and was there ſolempnlye receiued by the Biſhop of Wyncheſter Chaunceloz of England, who met him with Proceſſion. And ſhortly after, king Philip came from Weſtminſter by land, beyng accompanyed with a great number of his Nobles. And the ſame day the Biſhop of Wincheſter preached at Paules Croſſe, in the which Sermon he declared that the king & Queene had reſtored the Pope to his right of Primacie, and that the three eſtates aſſembled in Parliament, repreſentyng the whole bodie of the realme, had ſubmitted themſelues to his holineſſe, and to his ſucceſſors for euer. And in the ſame alſo he greatly prayſed the Cardinall, and ſet forth the paſſyng high auctoritie that he had from the Sea of Rome, with much other glorious matter in the commendation of the Church of Rome which he called the Sea Apoſtolique. The Sermon beyng ended, the king and the Cardinall ridyng together, returned to the Court at Whitehall: And the king had his ſworde borne before him, and the Cardinall had onely his Croſſe, and no more.

The. xxvij. of the ſayde Moneth the Duke of Sauoye called prince of Pyamount came into Englande, accompanied with diuers other Lordes and gentlemen ſtraungers, who were receaued at Graueſende by the Erle of Bedford Lorde priuie Seale, and conueyed by water through London bridge to whyte hall where the king and Queene then lay, and the. ix. of Januarye next followyng the prince of Orenge was in lyke maner receyued at Graueſend, and from thence conueyed to the Court, being at whyte hall.

The. xxij. of the ſame Moneth, the parliament (which began the. xxij. of Nouember before) was diſſolued, wherein among other actes paſſed there, the ſtatute ex officio and other lawes made for puniſhment of heretiques were repeled. But chiefly the Popes moſt liberall Bull of diſpenſation of Abbey lande was there confirmed much to the contentation of many, who not without cauſe ſuſpected by this newe vnion to leeſe ſome peece of their late purchaſe.

In Februarye next folowyng, Docter Thirlby Biſhop of Ely, and Anthony Lorde Mountagew with a very honorable traine of Gentlemen and other roade fourth of the Citie of London towardes Rome, as Ambassadours sent from the king and Queene to confirme thys newe reconciliation to the Pope.

William Fetherston a boy nameth himselfe king Edward the first.

About thys time a yong strypling, whose name was Wylliam Fetherstone a Mylliers sonne, about the age of. xviij. yeres, named and bruted himselfe to be king Edwarde the first, whereof when the Queene and the Counsaile heard, they caused with all diligence, inquirie to be made for him, so that he was apprehended in Southwarke, and brought before the counsayle at Hampton Court, and there examined. And it was demaunded of hym, why he so named himselfe, to the which, he counterfeytyng a maner of simplicitie or rather frensie would make no direct aunswere, but prayed pardon, for he wist not what he sayde, affirming farther that he was counsayled so to saye and to take vpon him the name, whereof he accused certayne persons, but his talke was not founde true, wherefore he was committed to the Marshalsea as a Lunatike foole. And the. xxviij. daye of Maye next folowyng, the aforesaide counterfeyte Prince was brought in a Cart from the Marshalsea, through the Citie of London with a paper on his head, wherein was written that he named himselfe king Edwarde. And from thence was conueyed to Westminster, beyng lead rounde about the hall and shewed to all the people there and afterwarde taken oute of the Cart and strypped, and then whypped rounde aboute the Palace at the same Cartes tayle, and without more punishment was discharged and set at libertie. But the yere next folowyng, for that he had spreade abroade that king Edwarde was alyue, and that he had spoken with him, he was agayne apprehended and arreigned of high treason, whereof beyng condempned, he shortly after was drawne to Tyborne and there hanged and quartered the. xiij. of Marche.

The Lorde Courtney set at libertie.

About this time Edward Courtney Erle of Deuonshire of whome before ye haue heard, was deliuered out of the Tower, and was licenced to depart into Italy, where shortly after he ended his life, beyng sick and dead in lesse then. xiiij. dayes, & was honorably buried at Padway. This Courtney was the onely sonne and heyre of Henry Marques of Exceter, Cosyn Germayne to king Henry the eyght as is sayde before, for the sayde king and he were discended of two sisters Elizabeth and Katheryn, two of the daughters of king Edward the fourth, which propinquitie of bloud notwithstanding, the sayd Marques for poynts of treason layde agaynst him suffred at the Tower hill the. xxx. yere of the reigne of king Henry the eyght, to the great dolour of the most of the subiectes of this realme, who for his sundrie vertues bare him great fauour. After whose death thys yong gentleman his sonne beyng yet a child was committed prisoner to the Tower, where he remained vntill the beginning of the reigne of this Queene Mary as before you haue heard. This gentleman as it appered was borne to be a prisoner, for from twelue yeres of age vnto. xxx. he had scarse two yeres liberty, within the which time he dyed, and obteyned quiet, which in his lyfe he coulde neuer haue.

Ambassadors sent to intreate a peace be-

In the Moneth of Maye next folowyng, Cardinall Poole who had bene a great laborer for peace betweene the French king and the Emperor, beyng accompanied with Stephyn Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester and

Chauncelor

Chauncelor of England, the Erle of Arondell high Stuard of England, and the Lorde Paget, were sent by the king and Queene ouer the sea to Calice, and from thence went to the towne of Marke, where they met with the Ambassadors of the Emperor and the French king. From the Emperor were sent the Bishop of Arras with other. From the French king was sent the Cardinall of Lorreine and the Constable of Fraunce. In this treatie Cardinall Poole sate as President and Umpiere in the name of the Queene of Englande. This peace was greatly labored, where at the first there was much hope, but in the ende nothing was concluded: Wherefore the .xvij. day of June, this assembly was dissolued, and the English Ambassadors returned againe into England.

twene the French king and the Emperour.

In the beginning of September. 1555. king Philip went ouer into Flaunders to the Emperor his father. And in the moneth of October next following, fell so great a rayne, that the aboundaunce thereof caused the Thames to swel so high, that for the space of foure or fiue dayes, the Boates and Barges rowed ouer all Saint Georges fielde, and the water roase so high at Westminster, that likewise a Boate might haue bene rowed from the one ende of the Hall to the other.

A great flood encreased by rayne.

About this time the Bishops of Lincolne, Glocester, and Bristow were sent in commission to Oxford by the Popes authoritie, to examine Ridley & Latimer vpon certain articles by them preached, which if they would not recant, and consent to the Popes doctrine, then had they power to proceede to sentence against them as Heretiques, and to commit them ouer to the secular power. Those two Doctors neuertheless, stood constantly to that which they had taught, and would not reuoke, for which cause they were sone condempned, and after burned in the towne Diche at Oxforde the sixtene day of October. In the time of whose examination, because the Bishops aforesayde declared themselues to be the Popes Commissioners, neyther Ridley nor Latimer would do them any reuerence, but kept their Cappes on their heddes, wherefore they were sharpely rebuked by the Bishop of Lincolne, and one of the officers was commaunded to take of their Cappes. Of these men and the maner of their death, ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Churche.

Commissioners sent to Oxenford.

A parliamẽt.

The .xxj. of October a parliament was holden at Westminster in the which among other thinges, the Queene beyng perswaded by the Cardinal (and other of her Clergy) that she could not prosper so long as she kept in her hands any possessions of the Church, did frankly and freely resigne and render vnto them all those reuenewes ecclesiasticall which by the authoritie of parliament in the time of king Henry had bene annexed to the crowne, called the first fruites and tenthes of all Bishoprickes, benefices and ecclesiasticall promotions: The resignation whereof was a great diminution of the reuennes of the crowne.

Queene Marie refuseth the first fruits and tenthes.

During the time of this parliament, Stephyn Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester and Chauncelor of England dyed at his house called Winchester place beside Saint Mary Ouerys in Southwarke the ninthe daye of November, whose Corps was shortely after very solempnely from thence conueyed to his church of Winchester, and there buried. After whose death, Nicholas Heath Archebishop of Yorke was preferred by the Queene to the office office of Chauncelor.

In the moneth of Marche next following, there was in maner none other talke but of the great preparation that was made for the Queenes lying in Childbed, who had already taken by her chamber, and sundry Ladies and Gentlewomen were placed about her in euery Office of the Courte. In somuche that all the Courte was full of Midwifes, Nurses and Rockers, and this talke continued almost halfe a yere, & was affirmed true by some of her Phisitians, & other persons about her, which seemed both graue & credible. Insomuch that diuers were punished for saying the contrary. And moreouer commaundement geuen in all Churches for Procession with supplications and prayers to be made to almighty God, for her safe deliuery, yea and diuerse prayers were specially made for that purpose. And the sayde rumor continued so long, that at the last report was made that she was deliuered of a Prince, and for ioy thereof, Belles were rong, and Bonefiers made, not onely in the Citie of London, but also in sundry places of the realme. But in the ende all proued cleane contrary, and the ioye and expectation of the people vtterly frustrate: For shortely it was fully certefied (all most to all men) that the Queene was as then, neyther deliuered of childe, nor after was in hope to haue any. Of this the people spake diuersly: Some sayde that the rumor of the Queenes conception was spred for a pollecy. Some affirmed that she was with childe, but it miscarried: Some other sayde that she was deceaued by a Timpanye or other like disease, whereby she thought she was with child and was not: But what the truth was I referre the report therof to other that knoweth more.

A rumor that Queene Mary was deliuered of a Prince.

About this tyme Brookes Bishop of Glouceſter, was by the Cardinall sent downe as Commissioner from the Pope to Oxford, there to sit vpon the examination of Thomas Cranmer Archebishop of Cauntorbury, in suche things as should be layd to hys charge by John Story, and Thomas Martyn Doctors in the lawes, sent specially in commission from the Queene. At which time, the sayd Archebishop, making lowe obedience to them that sate in the Queenes name, shewed no tokens of reuerence to the Bishop that was the Popes Commissioner, who neuertheleſſe proceeded agaynst him as Iudge, and conuicted him of herisie. Accordyng to the which sentence the xxi. day of Marche folowyng, he was disgraded by Edmonde Bonner, and Thomas Thirlby Bishops of London and Elye, sent downe for that purpose, and he was burned in the same place where Ridley and Latimer before had suffered. Before his death, by the perswasion of a Spanishe Frier named Frier John a reader of Diuinitie in Oxforde, and by the Counsaile of certaine other that put him in hope of life and pardon: he subscribed to a recantation, wherein he submitted himselfe wholy to the Church of Rome, and continued in the same mynd to outward appearaunce, vntill he was brought out of prison to go to the fire. Afore whose execution, a Sermon was made by Doctor Cole Deane of Paules in saint Maries Church in Oxford, who in the end of his sermō the said doctor Cole praied the people to encline their eares to such thinges as the sayde Cranmer would declare vnto them by his owne mouth, for (saith he) he is a man very repentant, & will here before you all reuoke his errors. Neuertheles, he did clene cōtrary, & with many teares protested, that he had subscribed to the sayde retantation agaynst his conscience, ence, onely for feare of death and hope of lyfe (which seemed to be true) for when he came to the stake, and the fyre kindeled, he put his right hande into the fyre, and helde it there a good space, saying that the same hand should first burne, because it helde the penne to subscribe agaynst his Lorde God. Cranmer put to death.

Immediately after the death of the sayde Bishop Cranmer, Cardinall Poole was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who during the lyfe of the other, would neuer be consecrate Archbishop. Who so desireth to see more of this matter, may see the same at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church, where you shall also finde that about this tyme many were in trouble for religion. Cardinall Poole made Archebishop of Cantorburie. Persecution for religion.

The .xxviij. day of the aforesayd Moneth of March, by the negligence of the keepers Mayde of the Gaole of Newgate in London, who left a Candle where a great deale of strawe was, the same was set on fyre and brent all the tymber worke on the Northside of the sayde Gate. Newgate set on fire.

The Sommer next folowyng was a new conspiracie brought to light, which was to haue rayled warre in the realme agaynst the Queene, for maintenaunce whereof their first enterprice was to haue robbed the treasorye of the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, as it fell onte afterwardes in proofe. The bitterer of which conspiracie was one Whyte, who at the beginnyng was made priuie to the same, whereupon diuers of the conspirators, namely, Henry Peckham, Daniell, Dethicke, Vdall, Throgmarton, and Capitain Stanton with diuers other were apprehended and executed. Moreouer Sir Anthony Kingston knight was accused and apprehended for the same, and dyed in the way commyng to London. A conspiracy Sir Anthony Kingston knight.

This yere the hote burnyng Feuers and other straunge diseases which began the yere before, consumed much people in all partes of Englande, but namely of most auncient and graue men. So that in London betweene the xx. of October, and the last of December, there dyed seuen Aldermen, whose names were, Henry Heardson, sir Richard Dabbes late Maior, Sir William Larston late Maior, Sir Henry Hobblethorne late Maior, Sir John Champneys late Maior, Sir John Aileph late Shriefe, and Sir John Gresham late Maior.

About this tyme came to London an Ambassador to the Queene from the Emperor of Cathay, Moscouia, and Russeland, who was honorably receyued by the Marchauntes of London hauyng trade in those Countreys, who bare all his costes and charges from the tyme of hys entrie into England out of Scotland (for thether by tempest of weather he was driuen, and there forced to lande.) And after his message and Ambassade done to the Queene, he departed againe with three fayre ships from Graueseude into his Countrey, when he had remayned here by the space of two Monethes and more. An Ambassadour out of Muscouia.

Also about this time the Lord Sturton for a verie shamefull and wretched murther committed by him vpō two gentlemen the father & the sonne, of the Surnames of Hargill beyng his neere neighbours, was apprehended and committed to the Tower of London. And although the Queene seemed to fauour him much, as one professing the catholique religion, yet when she vnderstood the truth of his vile deede, she abhorred him, and commaunded that he shoulde be vsed according to iustice. Wherefore shortly after he The Lorde Sturton apprehended for a murther & condemned and hanged at Salisburye.

was brought to Westminster and there arreigned and found guiltie and had iudgement as a murderer to be hanged, and for the same fact were likewise condemned foure of his seruaunts. And the second day of Marche next following, the sayde Lorde with his saide seruauntes were conueyed by the Queenes Garde from the Tower of London through the Citie, he hauing his armes pinyoned at his back, and his legges bound vnder the horse belly, and so carryed to Salisburie, where the first daye of Marche next he was hanged in the market place of the same towne, and his foure seruauntes were hanged in the Countrie neere vnto the place, where the murder was committed.

A great dearth, and after great plentie.

This yere for the more parte there was in Englande a great dearth, namely of corne, for Wheat and Rie were commonly solde for fiue shyllings and sixe shyllings a Bushell, and in some places at higher prices. But in the later ende of the yere towarde harueste, the price fell so muche, and specially after new corne was come into the Barne, that within lesse space then eyght weekes, from sixe shillings it fell to sixtene pence a Bushell and lesse.

The returne of king Philip into Englande.

This present month of March, king Philip who a long season had bene in Flaundrys to take possession and gouernement of the lowe Countries as is aforesayde, did now returne into England, and passed thorough London, beyng accompanied with the Queene, and dyuers nobles of the realme: But because a great warre was towarde betweene him and the Frenche king, he taryed not long here, but in the middest of Sommer passyng the Seas agayne into Flaundrys made great prouision for the same. At thys time the common people began to mutter and saye that king Philip sought occasions to be absent from the Queene. At which tyme report was made that the French king was verie loth to haue warre with England, albeit the Queene tangling her selfe in her husbandes quarrell, sent a defiaunce to the French king, by Clarenseaux her Herault, and not long after transported an armie of one thousande horsemen, foure thousande footemen, and two thousand pyoners to ayde the king her husbande. Of the which armie William Erle of Pembrooke was made generall, vnder whome many noble men and gentlemen (although dyuers suspected to be protestants) were by the Queenes commaundement appoynted to serue.

Queene Mary proclaymeth open warre wyth the french king.

The. xv. day of July dyed the Ladye Anne of Cleue at Chelsey, and was honorably buried at Westminster.

Saint Quintine besieged.

The Queenes armie being thus sent ouer, ioyned with the armie of king Philip and besieged the towne of saint Quintyne in Fraunce. For the rescue of which towne, shortly after, that is to saye the tenth of August beyng the daye of saint Laurence, the French king sent a great army vnder the conduct of Duke Mountmorency Constable of Fraunce to remoue ỹ siege of the said towne, and to geue king Philip battaile, if occasion so serued. The Frenche men pressing neere the towne to put in succours of mo souldiours, came within the daunger of king Philips horsemen, which beyng led by the Counteys of Aygmond, Horne, Mansfelt & the Dukes of Brunswike to the number of fiue thousand men of armes beside the Swart Rutters and light horsemen gaue suche a furious and cruell charge vpon the Frenchmen that they not able to resist the same were altogether defeated, and their battayles as well horsemen as footemen put to flight, whereof king Philip hauyng knowlege knowledge purſued them withall his forces, in which purſuyte were ſlayne of the frenchmen a great number, the cheefe whereof were theſe that folow. John of Burbone Duke of Anguien. The Viſcount of Turayn. The eldeſt ſonne of Roche du Mayn. The Lord of Chandenyer, with a great number of other gentlemen that bare armes in the field, and there were taken priſoners theſe followyng.

The Duke of Mountpencieur.
The Duke of Longueuyle.
The Marſhall of ſaint Andrew.
The Renegeaue Coronall of the Almaynes.
Roche du Mayn.
The Countie Rochefoucault.
The Viſcount of Tourayn.
The Baron of Curton.
The prince of Mantua.

Beſides many other Gentlemen and Capitaynes. And the .xviij. day of the ſame Month, by the ſpeciall ayde and helpe of the Engliſhe men, the towne of ſaint Quintine was taken, for when the other ſouldiours after diuers aſſaultes were repulſed and gaue ouer, the Engliſhe men of a ſtoute courage gaue a newe onſet, by reaſon whereof the towne was taken. And in rewarde of their well doyng, king Philip graunted them the ſacage of the ſame towne: But the ſwart Rutters which keepe no rule where they be ſtrongeſt, ſet vpon the Engliſh men in taſtyng of the ſpoyle and killed a great number of them. This grudge was with much difficultie appeaſed, and men thought that if the Engliſh men, beyng much fewer in number had not bene oppreſſed with the multitude of the other, that it would have growne to a great ſlaughter on both partes. At this ſiege the Lord Henry Dudley pongeſt ſonne to the Duke of Northumberlande was ſlayne with the ſhot of a great peece, as he ſtowped on the wall and reyed to rip his hoſe on the knee thereby to haue bene the more apt to the aſſault. After the wynning of this towne, newes in poſt were brought into England to the Queene, who cauſed generall proceſſions to be made and Te deum to be ſong, geuing all laude and prayſe vnto almightie God for this great victorie. And in the ſtreetes of euery Citie and towne of the realme were made Bonefires with great reioyſing: Which ſodayne ſhort gladneſſe turned very ſhortly after to a greate long ſorrow. For if ought were wonne by the hauing of ſaint Quintines, England gate nothing at all, for the gayne thereof came onely to king Philip. But the loſſe of Calice, Hammes, and Guyſnes with all the Countrie on that ſide the ſea, (which followed ſone after) was ſuche a buffet to Englande as happened not in more then an hundred yere before, and a diſhonor wherwith this realme ſhall be blotted, vntyll God ſhall geue power to requite it with ſome like requitall to the French.

Doctor Weſton beyng (as you haue heard before) preſolocutor of the conuocation houſe, was at this time in diſpleaſure with Cardinall Poole, and other Biſhoppes, becauſe he was vnwilling to reſigne his Deanery of Weſtminſter to the Queene, whoſe purpoſe was to place there (as in olde time before) the religion of Monkes, whome in deede he fauoured not, although in all other thinges he ſtood with the Church of Rome. Neuertheleſſe, by very importune ſuite or rather compulſion, he with his Colleges reſigned the Deanry of Weſtminſter. In recompence whereof, he was made Deane of Windsor, where not long after he was apprehended in adulterye, and for that fact was by the Cardinall depriued of all his spirituall liuyngs, from whose sentence he appealed to the courte of Rome. For the followyng of which appeale, he sought secretly to departe the realme: but he was apprehended by the waye, and committed to the Tower of London, where he remained prisoner, vntill by the death of Queene Mary, Queene Elizabeth came to the crowne, by whome he was set at libertie, and forthwith fell sicke and dyed. The common talke was, that if he had not so sodainly dyed, he woulde haue disclosed the purpose of the chiefe of the Clergy (meaning the Cardinall) whiche was to haue taken vp king Henryes bodye at Windsor to haue burnt it as many thought.

At this time, although open hostility and warre were betweene England and Fraunce, yet contrary to the auncient custome afore vsed, the towne of Calice and the Fortes there aboutes were not supplyed with any new accrues of souldiors, which negligence was not vnknowne to the enemie, who long before had practised the wynning of the sayd towne and countrye. The French king therefore beyng sharpely netteled with the late losse of Sainte Quintines, and a great peece of his countrye adioyning, and desirous of reuenge, thought it not meete to let slippe this occasion: And hauing presently a full army in readinesse to employ where most aduauntage should appere, determined with all speede to put in proofe the enterprice of Calice, which long and many tymes before was purposed vpon. This practise was not so secreat, but that the Deputies of Calice and Guines had some intelligence thereof, and informed the Queene and her counsaile accordingly. Nevertheless eyther by wilfull negligence there, or lacke of credite, by the Queenes euyll fayle here: this great case was so slenderly regarded, as no prouision of defence was made vntill it was somewhat to late. The Duke of Guise being Generall of the French Army, proceeded in this enterprice with meruelous polecy. For approching the English Frontier vnder colour to victayle Bulleyne and Arde, he entred the same vpon a sodaine, and tooke a litle Bulwarke at Sandgate by assaulte, and then deuided his armye into two partes; sendyng one parte with certaine peeces of great artillery along the Downes by the sea side, towardes Rise Banke: the other parte furnished also with battery peeces, marched strayte forth to Newnam Bridge: meaning to batter these two Fortes both at one tyme, which thing he did with such celeritie, that cōming thether very late in the euening: he was maister of both by the next morning, wherein the first shot discharged at Newnam bridge, the head of the maister Gunner of ỳ peece, whose name was Horseley, was cleane striken of. The Capitaine cōsidering the great power of the French army, & hauing his Fort but slenderly manned to make sufficient resistaunce, fled to Calice: And by ỳ time he was come thether: the other part of ỳ French army that went by ỳ sea side with their battery had woone Rice Banke, being abandoned to their hāds. The next day, the Frenchmen with fiue double & Cānones three Culuerins began a battery from ỳ sand hilles next Rice Bank, against ỳ towne of Calice & cōtinued the same by the spate of two or three dayes vntill they made a litle breache of the wall, next into the Water Gate, which nevertheless was not yet assaultable, for that which was broken in the day, was by them within the towne made vp againe in the the night stronger then afore. But the batterie was not begonne there by the French, for that they entended to enter in that place, but rather to abuse the Englishe to haue the lesse regarde to the defence of the Castell, which was the weakest part of the towne, and the place where they were asserteyned by their espyalles to win an easie entrye. So that whyle our people trauayled fondely to defende that counterfeyt breach of the towne wall: the Duke had in the meane season planted.xb. double Cannons against the Castell, which Castell being considered by the rulers of the towne to be of no such force as might resist the battery of the Cannon (by reason it was olde and without any rampiers) it was deuised to make a trayne wyth certayne Barrels of powder to this purpose, that when the frenchmen should enter (as they well knewe that there they would) to haue fyred the sayde trayne and blowne vp the keepe, and for that purpose left neuer a man within to defend it. But the Frenchmen at their entry espyed the trayne and so auoyded the same, so that deuise came to no purpose, and without any resistaunce they entred the Castell, and thought to haue entred the towne by that waye: But by the prowes and hardy courage of syr Anthony Ager knight and Marshall of the towne with his souldiors they were repulsed and driuen backe agayne into the Castell, and so hard followed after, that our men forced them to close and shut the Castell gate for their suretie, least it should haue beene recouered against them as it was once attempted by Sir Anthony Ager, who there with his sonne and heyre, and a Pursiuaunt at Armes called Calice with diuers other to the number of.xb. or.xbj. Englishmen lost their liues.

Sir Anthony Ager and his sonne slayne.

The same night after the recule of the Frenchmen, whose number so encreased in the Castell, that the towne was not able to resist their force. The Lorde Wentworth Deputie of Calice, sent a Pursiuaunt called Guynes vnto the Duke of Guise requiring composition, which after long debate was agreed vpon in this sort. First that the towne with all the great artillary, victualles, and munition, should be freely yelden to the Frenche king, the liues of the inhabitaunts onely saued, to whome safeconduyte should be graunted to passe where they lysted, sauing the Lorde Deputie with fiftie such other as the Duke should appoint to remaine prisoners, and be put to their raunsome.

Calice deliuered to the French.

The next morning, the Frenchmen entred and possessed the towne, and forthwith al the men, women, and children, were commaunded to leaue their houses, and to go into the two Churches of our Lady and Saint Nicholas vpon paine of death, where they remayned a great part of that daye, and one whole night, & the next day vntill three of the clock at after none, without eyther meat or drink. And while they were thus in the Churches, the Duke of Guyse in the name of the French king, in their hearings made a proclamation, straightly charging and commaunding al & euery person that were Inhabitaunts of the towne of Calice, hauing about them any money, plate, or Jewels, to the value of one grote to bring the same forthwith, and laye it downe vpon the highe Aultars of the sayde Churches vpon paine of death, bearing them in hande also that they should be searched: By reason of which Proclamation there was made a great and sorrowfull offertory. And while they were at this offering within the Churches, the Frenchmen entered into their houses, and ryfled the same, where was found inestimable riches and treasure: But specially of ordinaunce, armor and other munition. Aboute two of the clocke the next day at after noone, beyng the seuenth of January, all the Englishe men (except the Lorde Deputie, and the other reserued for prisoners) were suffered to passe out of the towne in safetie, beyng garded through the armie with a number of Scottishe light horsemen. There were in this towne of Calice fiue hundred Englishe Souldiors ordinary, and no mo. And of the townes men not fully two hundred fighting men, (a small garrison for the defence of such a towne) and there were in the whole number of men, women, and children, as they were counted (when they went out of the Gate) foure thousand and two hundred persons. But the Lorde Wentworth Deputie of Calice, Sir Raufe Chamberleyn Capitaine of the Castell, Harlestone Capitain of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Capitaine of Newnambridge, Edwarde Grymstone the Comptroller, with other of the chiefe of the towne to the number of fiftie (as aforesayd) such as it pleased the Duke of Guise to appoint, were sent prisoners into Fraunce.

The garrison of souldiours that were in Calice.

Thus haue ye heard the discourse of the ouerthrowe and losse of the towne of Calice, the which enterprice was begonne and ended in lesse then viij. dayes, to the great maruaile of the worlde, that a towne of such strength and so well furnished of all thinges as that was, should so sodainly be taken and conquered: But most specially in the winter season, what tyme all the Country about beyng marshe ground is commonly ouerflowen with water. The sayde towne was wonne from the French, by king Edward the thirde, in the tyme of Philip de Valoys then French king. And beyng in the possession of the kings of Englande two hundred. xj. yeres, was in the time of Philip and Mary, king and Queene of England, lost within lesse then. viij. dayes, beyng the most notable forte that Englande had: For the winnyng wherof king Edward aforesayde in the. xxj. yere of his reigne was faine to continue a siege one whole yere and more, wherefore it was iudged of all men, that it could not haue come so to passe without some secrete trechery.

Here is also to be noted, that when Queene Mary and her Counsaile heard credibly of the French mens sodaine approche to that towne, she with all speede possible (but somewhat to late) raysed a great power for the reskue thereof, which if winde and weather had serued, might happily haue brought succour thether in tyme. But such terrible tempestes then arose and continued the space of foure or fiue dayes together, that the like had not bene seene before in remembraunce of man, wherefore some sayde that the same was done by necromancy, and that the Deuill was raysed vp, and become French (the truth whereof is knowne to God) but very true it is that no ship could brooke the Seas by reason of those extreeme stormes and tempestes. And such of the Queenes shippes as did aduenture the passage, were so shaken and torne with violence of weather, as they were forced to returne with great daunger, and with the losse of all their tackle and furniture. Thus by negligence of the Counsail at home, conspiracie of traytors elsewhere, force and false practise of enemyes, holpen by the rage of most terrible tempestes, of contrary wynds and weather, this famous Forte of Calice was brought againe to the handes and possession of the French.

So soone as this Duke of Guyse, contrary to all expectation, had in so few dayes gayned this strong towne of Calice (afore thought impregnable)

and had put the same in such order as best seemed for his aduantage: prowde of the spoyle, and prellyng forwarde vpon his sodain fortune, without geuing long tyme to the residue of the Capitaynes of the fortes there, to breath vpon their businesse, the. xiij. day of the sayde Moneth, with all prouision requisite for a siege, marched with his army from Calice vnto the towne and fort of Gupnes, fiue myles distaunt from thence. Of which towne and Castell, at the same tyme, there was Capitaine a valiaunt Baron of England called William Lorde Gray of Wilton, who not without cause suspectyng a siege at hande, and knowyng the towne of Gupnes to be of small force, as beyng without walles or Bulwarkes, compassed onely with a trench before the French mennes arriuall had caused all the inhabitauntes of the towne to auoyde, and so many of them as were apt to beare armes, he caused to retire into the Castell, which was a place well fortifyed with strong and massy Bulwarkes of Bricke, hauyng also a high and mightie tower of great force and strength, called the keepe. The towne being thus abandoned, the frenchmen had the more easie approche to the Castell who thinkyng to fynde quiet lodgyng in those vacant houses entered the same without any feare. And beyng that night at their rest (as they thought) a chosen band of Souldiours appointed by the Lorde Gray, issued out by a posterne of the sayde Castell, and slue no small number of their sleepie gheskes, and the rest they put out of their newe lodgynges, and mauger the Duke and all the French power, consumed all the houses of the towne with fyre. That notwithstandyng the sayde Duke with all diligence began his trenches, and albeit the shot of the great Artillarie from the Castell was terrible, and gaue him great impechment: yet did he continue his worke without intermission, and for examples sake wrought in his owne person as a common Pioner or labourer. So that within lesse then three dayes, he brought to the number of. xxxb. battery peeces, hard to the brim of the Castell ditch to batter the same on all sydes, aswell foorthright as a crosse. But his principall battery he planted agaynst the strongest Bulwarke of all called Mary Bulwarke, thinkyng by gainyng of the stronger, to come more easily by the weaker.

His battery being thus begonne, he continued the same by ỹ space of two dayes with suche terrible thundering of great artillarie, that by report of Rabutyne a Frenche writer, there were in those few dayes discharged well nere to the number of eyght or nine thousand Canon shot. Through the violence whereof, by the twentie daye of the sayde Moneth, the sayde great Bulwarke was layde wyde open, and the breache made reasonable and easie ynough for the assault. Neuertheless, the sayde Duke beyng a man of warre, and nothing ignorant what deuises be commonly vsed in Fortes and townes besieged, to entrap and dammage the assaylaunts, afore he would put the persons of his good souldiours to the hazard of the assault, caused the breache to be vewed once or twice by certayne forwarde and skilfull souldiours, who mountyng the top of the breache brought report that the place was saultable. Neuertheless, to make the clyme more easie, he caused certayne Arquebusiers to passe ouer the diche, and to keepe the defendauntes occupied with shot, while certayne pyoners with mattockes and shouelles made the breache more playne and easie, which thing done accordingly, he gaue order to Mounsire Vandalot coronall of the Frenche footemen, that he with his bandes should be in readynesse to geue the assault when signe should be geuen. In which meane time the Duke withdrew himselfe to an higher grounde, from whence he might playnely discouer the behauiour as well of his souldiours in the assault geuing, as also of the defendauntes in aunswering the same. And perceyuing not so many of the Englishe part appearing for defence (as he looked for) gaue order forthwith that a regiment of his most forwarde Launceknightes shoulde mount the breache to open the first passage, and that Mounsire Dandalot with his bandes of the French should back them, which order was followed with such whot haste and desperate hardinesse, that entring a deepe diche full of water, from the botome whereof to the top of the breach was well forty foote, without feare eyther of the water beneath, or the fyre aboue, they mounted the breache. And where as ꝑ Duke had prepared dyuers bridges made of planke bords borne vp with Casque and emptie pypes tyed one to another for his men to passe the sayde diche, many of the sayde assaylauntes without care of those bridges plunged into the water, and tooke the next waye to come to the assault. Which hotte haste notwithstanding, the sayde assaylauntes were in this first assault so stoutly repulsed and put backe by the defendaunts beyng furnished with great store of wylde fyre and other fyrecastes for the purpose, that they were turned downe hedlong one vpon an other, much faster then they came vp, not without great waste and slaughter of their best and most braue souldiours, to the small comfort of the stout Duke, who (as is sayde before) stood all this while vpon a little hyll, to behold thys busynesse: wherfore not enduryng this sight any longer, as a man arraged ranne amongest his men, so reprouing some, and encouragyng other, that the assault was foote hot renued, with muche more vehemence and furie then before, and wyth no lesse obstinacie and desperation receyued by the defendaunts, whereby all the breache vnderneath was fylled with french carkasses. Thys notwithstanding, the Duke still redoubled his forces with freshe companies, and contynued so many assaultes one vpon an other, that at the last charge beyng most vehement of all the other, our men beyng tyred and greatly minished in their number by slaughter & bloudy woundes, were of fyne force driuen to auoyde, and gaue place of entry to the enemie, which was not done without a maruaylous expence of bloud on both sydes: For of the Frenche part there were slayne and perished in these assaultes aboue the number of eyght or nine hundred, and of the Englishe but little fewer, amongst whom the greatest losse lighted vpon the Spaniardes who tooke vpon them the defence of the sayde Mary Bulwarke, insomuch (as the report went) that of fyue hundred braue souldyours which king Philip sent thether for succours vnder the conduite of a valiant Capitayne Spanyard, called Mountdragon: there were not knowne to haue commen away any number worth the reckning, but eyther slayne, maimed or taken. These outrageous assaults were geuen to the Castell of Guynes on the daye of saint Sebastian the .xx. of January aforesayde. Afore the ende of which day, there were also gayned from the English two other principall Bulwarkes of the sayde Castell, which beyng likewise made assaultable by battery were taken by the Almaynes and entred into by the breaches.

The Lord Graye with his eldest sonne and the chiefe Capytaynes and souldiours souldiours of the sayde Garrison, who kept the inner warde of the Castell (where the most high and principal Tower called the Keepe stood) thinking themselues in small suretie there, beyng a place of the olde sort of fortification, after they sawe the vtter warde possessed by the enemie, and suche a number of the most forwarde souldyours consumed and spent, and no lykelyhood of any more ayde to come in time, by the aduise of the most expert souldiours there, concluded for the best to treat with the Duke for composition, according to the which aduise he sent foorth two gentlemen with this message in effect: That the Duke beyng a man of warre, and seruing vnder a king, should not thinke it straunge if the Lord Gray beyng lykewise a man of warre and seruing his prince in lyke maner, did his deuour in well defending the place committed to his charge, so farforth as to answere and bide the assault: Considering that otherwise he could neuer saue his owne honor, neyther his truth and loyaltie to his prince: In respect whereof according to the lawe of armes, he required honorable composition, which message though it was well accepted of the Duke: yet he deferred his answere vntill the morow, what time the messengers repayring to him agayne, composition was graunted in this sort.

First, that the Castell with all the furniture thereof, aswell victuales, as great artillery, powder and all other munitions of warre, shoulde be wholy rendered without wasting, hiding or minishment thereof.

Secondarily, that the Lorde Gray with all the Capitaines, Officers, and other hauing charge there, should remayn prisoners at the Dukes pleasure to be raunsomed after the maner of warre.

Thirdely, that all the rest aswell souldiors as other should safely depart with their armour and baggage to what partes it seemed them best: Neuertheless to passe without sounde of Drome or Trumpet or displayyng of any Ensignes, but to leaue them behinde.

These condicions beyng receyued and approued on eyther partie, the day following, that is to wyt, the two and twentie day of the sayde Moneth of January, all the souldiors of the sayd fortresse, aswell English as Straungers with all the rest of the inhabitaunts and other, except the Lorde Graye Sir Arthure his sonne, Sir Henry Palmer knight, Mountdragon aboue named Capitayne of the Spanyardes and other men of charge reserued by the cõposicion, departed with their bag and baggages, from thence towards Flaunders. At whose issuyng foorth, there was esteemed to the number of eyght or nine hundred hable men for the warre, part English, part Burgonyons, with a small remnaunt of Spanyardes.

After the winning of this towne and Castell, the Duke aduising well vpon the place, and considering that if it shoulde happen to be regayned by English men, what a noysome neighbour the sãe might be to Calice now beyng French, and specially what empeachement should come thereby for the passage thether from Fraunce, considering also the nere standing thereof to the French kinges fortresse of Arde, so that to keepe two garrisones so nigh together, shoulde be but a double charge, and not onely needelesse, but also daungerous for the cause afore rehersed. Upon these considerations (as the Frenchmen write) he tooke order for all the great artillery victuales and other munition to be taken forth, and the Castell with all the Bulwarkes and other fortifications there, with all speede to be rased and throwne downe, and the stuffe to be caried away and employed in other more necessary places.

Hammes Castell.

Then rested nothing within all the English Pale on that side vnconquered but the litle Castel or Pile called Hammes, which though it were but of small force, made by art & industery of mannes hand, & beyng altogether of olde workemanship without Rampiers or Bulwarkes: yet nevertheless by the naturall scituation thereof, beyng on all sides enuironed with Fennes and Marshe groundes, it coulde not easely be approched vnto, either with great ordinaunce for the battery, or else with any armye to encampe there for a siege, hauing but one straycht passage thereto by a narow causye trauersed and cut throughout in diuers places, with deepe ditches alwayes full of water, which thing beyng well forseene by Edwarde Lorde Dudley then Capitayne there, hauing as good cause to suspect a siege there as his neighboures had, afore the Frenchmennes comming to Guynes: caused all the Bridges of the sayde Causey beyng of woode to be broken, to geue therby the more impechement to the Frenche, if they shoulde attempt to approche the same, as shortly after they dyd, and kept dyuers of the passages: But to deliuer the Duke and his souldiors from that care, there came to him glad newes from those that had charge to watche the sayde Cawsey, how the Capitaine hauing intelligence of the rendering of Guynes, secretly the same night, had conueyed himselfe, with his small garrison by a secret passage ouer the Marrys into Flaunders: wherby the Duke beyng now past care of any further siege to be layde, in all that Frontier tooke order foorthwith to seale the sayd litle Forte into his handes, as it was easy to do, when there was no resistaunce.

Edward lord Dudley.

When this peece was once seazed by the French, then remayned there none other place of defence or strength of ỳ English on all that side the Sea for the safegard of the rest of the countrye, whereby the French king became wholy and throughly Lorde and Maister of all the English Pale, for now (as ye haue heard) there was neyther towne, Castell, nor other Fortresse more or lesse on that side (sauing Bootes Bulwarke nere to Graueleyng which now king Philipe keepeth as his) but that it was eyther taken away by force, or else abandoned & left open to the enemy. And (as the Frenchmen write) beside the great riches of Golde and Siluer Coyne, Jewels, Plate, Woolles, and other Marchandise (which was inestimable) there were found three hundred peeces of Brasse mounted on wheeles, and as many peeces of Iron, with such furniture of powder, pellettes, Armour, vittuals and other munitions of warre, skarcely credible.

Bootes Bulwarke.

Thus haue you heard the whole discourse of the conquest of the noble towne of Calice, with all the Englishe fortresses and Countrey adioynyng made by the Duke of Guyse, the newes whereof when they came to the French king, no neede to aske how ioyfully they were receyued, not onely of him and all his Court, but also vniuersally throughout the whole Realme of Fraunce. For the which victorye there was (as the maner is) Te deum song, and bonefiers made euery where, as it is wont to be in cases of common ioy and gladnesse for some rare benefite of God, insomuch that shortly vpon thys conquest there was a publike assembly at Paris of all the states of Fraunce, who frankely in recompence of the kinges charges employed in winnyng of

Calice

Calice and the places afozesayde, and foz maintenaunce of his warres to be continued afterwardes, graunted vnto him three Millions of French crownes, whereof the Clergie of Fraunce contributed one Million beside theyr diſmes. And no marualle though the French did highly reioyce at the recouery of Calice out of the Engliſhmens handes: Foz it is conſtantly affirmed of many, that be acquainted with the affayres of Fraunce, that euer ſithen the ſame towne was firſt wonne by Engliſhe men, in all ſolempne Counſayles aſſembled to treat vpon the ſtate of Fraunce, there was a ſpeciall perſon appoynted to put them in remembraunce from tyme to tyme of Calice, as it were to be wiſhed, that the like were vſed in Englande vntill it were regayned from the French.

Now ſemed euery day a yere to the French king vntill he perſonally had viſited Calice, and his newe conquered countrye: Wherefoze about the ende of January afozeſayde, he tooke his voyage thether accompanied with no ſmall number of his Nobilitie. And immediatly vpon his arriuall there he perꝛoſed the whole towne and euery parte thereof from place to place, deuiſing with the Duke of Guyſe foz the better foztification thereof, what ſhould be added to the olde, and what ſhould be made newe, and what ſhould be taken a way. And after ozder taken foz that buſineſſe, he placed there a noble and no leſſe valiaunt knight called Mounſier de Thermes to be Capitayne of the towne, and ſo departed agayne into Fraunce.

Mounſire de Thermes made Captaine of Calice.

After the French kinges departure from Calice, he made great haſt foz the accompliſhment of the mariage, mooued betweene Fraunces his eldeſt ſonne called the Dolphin, and Mary Stewart daughter and ſole heire of Iames the fift, late king of Scotlande, which Pzinces if Scottes had bene faythfull of pzomiſe (as they ſeldome be) ſhould haue maried with king Edwarde the ſixt: Foz the bzeche of which pzomyſe began all the warre betweene England and Scotland, as you heard in the latter ende of the life of king Henry the eyght, and in the begiñing of king Edward the ſixt. This mariage (though it be not of my matter) I thought not to omit, foz that many thinges were ment thereby, which thankes be to God neuer came to effect. But one ſpeciall poynt was not hidden to the wozlde, that by meane of the ſame, the realme of Scotlande ſhoulde foz euermoze haue remayned as vnited and encozpozate to the Crowne of Fraunce, and that as the ſonne and heire of euery French king doth ſucceede to the inherytaunce and poſſeſſion of a countrye called the Doulphyn, and is therefoze called Doulphyn. And like as the pzincipalitie of Wales appertayneth to the eldeſt ſonne of England, who therefoze is called the Pzince of Wales. Euen ſo the Doulphyn & heire of Fraunce ſhoulde therby haue beene king of Scotland foz euermoze. Which name and title vpon this mariage was accozdingly geuen to Fraunces Doulphyn and heire apparaunt of Fraunce to be called king Doulphyn. The meaning whereof was vtterly to exclude foz euermoze any to be king of Scotlande, but onely the eldeſt ſonne of Fraunce. This memozable mariage was ſolempnized in the Citie of Paris, the .xxiiij. day of Apzill in the yere of Chziſt. 1558. with moſt magnifique pompe and triumph, and honored with the pzeſenſe of the moſt part of the Pzinces, Pzelates, Lozdes, and Barons of both the realmes, as it were foz a confirmation of this new aliaunce, which as it was much to the aduantage and benefit of Fraunce, ſo nothing thing coulde be more preiudice and derogation of the crowne to Scotland, as a deuise tending to the perpetuall abolition and extinguyshment of the name and estate of kinges in that realme.

But now to returne to the matters of England, from which I haue in part digressed. The newes of this conquest of Calice, were not so ioyfully receaued in Fraunce, as they were generally greuous and displesant to the whole realme of Englande: But specially to Queene Mary, who beyng a Prince of heart and courage more then commonly is in womankinde, thought her selfe so much touched in honor by the losse of her sayd towne and possessions on that side the sea, as shee counted her life pleasome, vntill the same were eyther recouered agayne, or the losse redubbled with some like victory agaynst the French elsewhere. In respect whereof, she ceased not to trauayle aswell with king Philip her husband, as with her owne priuie counsayle and the Lordes of the realme, what waye shoulde be best to reuenge this iniurye, and specially now whilst the Frenche king was occupied in warre with king Philip, to endamage some of his countryes by way of inuasion and to surprise some of his townes vpon the sodayne. And among sundry deuises, none was thought so fyt to be attempted, as an Hauen towne in Brytaine called Brest, which in the time of king Richarde the second and long before was kept and maintayned with an English garrison vntill the said king rendered the same to the French king agayne by composicion. This towne aswell for the conuenient situation, alwayes ready to receaue fresh succours and victualing out of England by Sea, as also for that it was knowne to the Queene and her counsayle at that present not to be furnished with any Garrison of Souldiers sufficient to repulse the power of a Prince vpon the sodaine, was thought the best marke to be shot at for the time. Wherefore vpon this case well debated, there was immediat order geuen to Edward Lorde Clynton then high Admirall of England, with all expedicion to prepare himselfe with all the Queenes shippes of warre, furnished with souldiors, munition and victuall, to ioyne with the Admyrall of king Philip, who had like order from the sayd king to ioyne with the Nauie of England, for the atchieuing of this enterprice. But before I declare to you the aduenture of these two great Nauies by sea: it shall not be impertinent to touch some accidentes in the meane time by land.

Brest in Britaine.

The Lorde Clinton Admirall.

Whiles king Philip beyng absent from the low countrye, was (as you haue heard) occupied with his warres in Fraunce, Mounsier de Thermes the new Capitayne of Calice, beyng a man very expert in the warres (whose propertie is neuer to neglect any time of aduauntage) cast in his minde how during king Philippes absence, to do some singuler seruice to the Frenche king. And espying well the beastiality of the Fleminges his Neighbours, how litle they vnderstood the great weakning of their countrye by the losse of Calice, and that there was no new prouision made for the defence thereof more then was before, whilst Calice was Englishe, by the losse whereof, their Frontires was now become open for the French at all times to enter: He therefore taking out of Calice so many of his souldiors as might be spared from thence, adioyning to them all the forces of the French Garrisons in Artoys, Bullenoyse, and Picardy, whereof (besides the Souldiours of Calice being to the number of seuen hundred footemen, and three hundred

This Capitayne following his enterprise, of a pollecy passing by the towne of Graueling, layde siege to a litle towne not far from thence called Berghes, which he wanne in a small time and with small resistance, leauing the sacrage of the same vnto his Souldiors, where they founde many good booties. And without long staying they marched forth to Dunkirck afore-sayde, and planting a siege in lyke maner there, battered the same so sharpely with the Cannon, that within lesse then foure dayes he became Maister of the towne, which he in like maner put to the sack, where was found more plentie of spoyle and good booties, then in any place before, so far forth as the meanest slaues and Lackeies came away riche. And after, setting the towne a fyre (whereby all the country about were meruelously put in feare) in his returne homewardes he tooke the streight way to Graueling. And staying his Army there certayne dayes by reason of sodaine sickenesse comming vpon him, there were dayly skirmishes betweene the French and the Garrison men of Graueling.

Dunkircke de sieged, taken & burnt by the Frech

During this passime, the Countie Aiguemount (whome we call Egmond) Lieuetenaunt Generall for king Philip in the lowe countrye, with all hast possible assembled all the power aswell of king Philipes Garrisons as also of men of warre in the low countrye to the number of .xiiij. or xv. thousand footemen, and two or three thousand horsemen, whereof there were fiftene hundred Swart Rutters, determining so to affront the Frenche, that eyther they should passe no farther into the countrye, or at the least waye to empeach them from the siege of Graueling, whereof there was great apparaunce.

Countie Egmond.

Mounsire de Thermes heering of this power assembled (though scarcely well recouered) made all possible hast toward Graueling, where he was no soner arriued, but that he saw his enemies ready raunged in the field. By reason whereof, leauing of the pursuyng of his entended siege: his studie was now nothing else but how he might bring home his company in safegarde to Calice.

The Countie of Egmond, espying the Frenchmen bent to march away with the spoyle of the countrye, cut betweene them and home, placing his battailes in such order, that the Frenchmē had no way to passe, but vpon the Sandes betweene the towne & the sea: where as by good chaunce lay a great Fleete of Queene Maryes shippes of warre, within the daunger of whose Gunshot, the Frenchmen had no shift but to passe as their iourney lay. And so beyng forced eyther to famishe or to fight at disaduauntage, Mounsier Thermes without staying any longer, caused his Vantgard to passe ouer the Ryuer somewhat neere the towne to auoyde the shotte of the Englishe shippes. And staying vpon the further side for the residue of his battayles there there came such thicke Hayleshot of Artillery out of the towne of the one side and from the English shippes on the other side, that there was a full battery made vpon the Frenchmen on all sides, which they neuertheless abode without breaking order for the time, when sodainely appered before them two great troupes of horsemen of .xv. hundred a peece, part Swart Rutters and part Burgonions, whereof the one in front, and the other in flanke, gaue strong charges, vpon the French Vauntgard, who beyng well backed with their other battayles (whereof the most part had then passed the Riuer) stoutly repulsed these two first troupes, though not without losse of many their best souldiors. So thus both partes beyng at a staye, and seuered somewhat a sunder: The Countie Egmond himselfe with .xviij. hundred men of Armes, and his foote battayles following, afore the French had wel recouered breath, recharged vpon them with all his forces together so terribly that he shokt all their battayle, and the number fell to a mayne flight without further tryall. So by that time that the footmen on eyther side came to the push of ꝑ Pique, the victory was sone had, by reason (as ꝑ French men report) that the Almaynes beaten backe with artillery aswell of the towne as of the shippes afore sayde, brake their order and came not to the Shocke, whereby the whole charge of the battayle rested vpon the French bandes onely. This fielde was foughten the .xiij. day of July .1558. vpon the Sea Sandes, nere to Graueling, wherein besides those that were slayne, beyng esteemed to the number of fiue thousand fighting men: There were taken prisoners Mounsire de Thermes Capitaine of Calice, Mounsire Senarpont Capitayne of Bullayne, Mounsire Villebone Gouernor of Picardy, Mounsire Annebault, Mounsire Mozuilliers, and Mounsire Chanly, beside a multitude of Gentlemen, and valiaunt Capitaynes, and souldiors, but specially the bandes of Calice went to wracke, so as very fewe returned home to bring tidinges: which gaue such a terror to the souldiors remayning in Calice: that it is verily beleued that if the Admirals of Englande and Flaunders had bene present there wyth their Nauies, as the sayd other fewe shippes of England were, and vpon this sodayne had attempted Calice with the ayde of the Countie Egmond hauing his power present: the towne of Calice might haue beene recouered again with as litle difficultie & haply in as shorte a time as it was before gained by ꝑ Duke of Guyse. But the sayde Admyrall as it appered, knew nothing thereof, wherefore following their prescribed course, and ioyning together at the place appointed, sayled from thence with prosperous winde and wether, and by the .xxix. day of the same moneth and in the sayd yere with seuen score Shippes of warre appered by breake of the day before the hauen of Conquest commonly called Conquet in Britayne, standing vpon the mouth of the Riuer that commeth from Brest: At whose arriuall there (as the maner is) they sounded their Trumpetes, and with a thunderyng peale of great ordinaunce gaue alowde Salue to the Britaines. And by eyght of the clocke the same morning, maulgre all the power of the country being assembled there in Armes, with many peeces of great Artillery to defend the entery of their porte: The Englishmen mannyng foorth their Shipboates, with many valiaunt Capitaines and souldiors, recouered landing and within short time became Maisters of the said town of Conquet, which they put to ꝑ sacrage with a great Abbey and many prettie townes and villages nere there aboutes, where our men founde great store of pillage and good booties. But the Flemynges beyng couetous of the spoyle, passing further into the lande, before they could recouer their shippes agayne, were encountred by the power of the Country, by whome there were slayne of them to the number of foure or fiue hundreth. The Admirals perceauing the power of the Countrie greatly to increase, and hauing intelligence that the Duke of Estamps the french kings Lieuetenaunt in Britayne, was very neere comming on with a great number of horsemen and footemen, esteemed to be about twentie thousande (as the Frenchemen themselues affirme) thought not best to attempt any assault against the towne of Brest, or to make longer aboade there. Wherefore after they had set fyre on the towne of Conquet and all the villages thereabouts, they embarked themselues, and tooke the sea agayne with their booties all in safetie (except the Fleminges) thinking to doe some further exploit elsewhere vpon the coast. But by this time there were such numbers of people raysed in all those partes for defence of the same coastes, that the Admyrals afterwardes attempting in dyuers places to lande their men, and finding eche where more apparaunce of losse then of gayne, returned home without atcheeuing their pretensed enterprise.

In this meane whyle king Philip and the French king with two most puyssaunt armies affronted eche other neere vnto the water of Some, eyther of them being obstinately bent to driue the other out of the fielde, for which cause they entrenched their Campes. During which time, there was nothing done betweene them worthie memorie, more then daylie skirmishes of no great accompt. Neuertheless the Countrie of Fraunce could not but susteyne extreme dammage in so long susteyning suche a maine multitude, specially of men of warre which those two mightie kinges had assembled. And day by day came freshe companies to eyther party, so as it was thought a thing impossible that suche two princes beyng so neere could depart without some cruell bloudy battayle to determine their quarelles: But God in whose handes are the hearts of kinges (when least hope was) conuerted their obstinate mindes from warre to peace, which came chiefely to passe by the mediation of the Duches of Lozeyn, who had bene a long and earnest trauayler to that ende, and neuer ceassed vntill by her intercession both the sayde kings appointed speciall Commissioners to treat vpon peace. So that after dyuers conferences, they at last concluded vpon all controuersies except the matter of Calice, wherof Queene Mary by her Ambassadors required restitution: But the French partie would in no wise here therof. By reason of which difficultie, this treatie could not come to any good conclusion. King Phyllip thinking himselfe bound in honor to stand in that case with the Queene his wyfe, who for his sake had entred into a needlesse warre against Fraunce, and thereby lost her sayde towne with all the Countrie adioyning as you haue heard before, did therefore staye a long time, before he concluded peace with the French king. 1558 6

Queene Marie seing no lykelyhood nor hauing any hope of the restitution of Calice, and considering also that most of her affayres had but hard successe, conceaued an inwarde sorrowe of minde, by reason wherof about September next ther fell sick of a hote burning Feuer, which sickenesse was common common that yere throughout all the realme and consumed a marueilous number, as well noble men, as Bysshops, Iudges, Knightes, Gentlemen and riche Farmours: But most of the Clergy and other auncient and graue persons. In which, whyle the Queene laye languyshing of a long sickenesse, and so continued vntill the. xvij. of Nouember next betweene the houres of fiue or sixe in the morning, and then ended her life in this woorld at her house of saint Iames beside Westminster, when she had reigned fiue yeres, foure Monethes and a. xj. dayes, and in the. xliij. yere of her bodily age. And the same day about sixe of the clock in the euening dyed Cardynall Poole, Legate of the Bishop of Rome, late afore made Archebishop of Cauntorbury, at his house ouer against Westminster called Lambeth. This Cardinall was discended of the house of Clarence, that is to saye, one of the yonger sonnes of Margaret Countesse of Salisburie, daughter of George Duke of Clarence, brother to king Edwarde the fourth. The death of this sayde Queene made a marueilous alteration in this realme, namely in the case of religion, which like as by the death of king Edward the first it suffred a chaunge from the establishment of his time: So by the death of this Queene it returned into the former estate.

Queene Elizabeth.

When true knowlege was had that Queene Mary was deceassed, who left her lyfe in this worlde the .xvij. day of Nouember as is before mencioned in the latter ende of her history in the time of a Parliament, the Lordes that were assembled in the vpper house, beyng resolued according to the lawes of the land to declare the Lady Elizabeth, sister to the sayde Queene Mary, to be very true and lawfull heire to the crowne of England, sent immediatly to the Speaker of the sayde Parliament, willing him with the Knightes and Burgesses of the nether house without delaye to repayre vnto them into the vpper house, for their assents in a case of great importaunce. Who beyng come thether, after silence made (as the maner is) the Archebishop of Yorke Chauncellor of Englande whose name was Nicholas Hethe Doctor in diuinitie, stoode vp and pronounced in effect these wordes folowyng. The cause of your calling hether at this time is to signifie vnto you, that all the Lordes here present are certainely certefied that God this present Morning hath called to his mercy our late soueraigne Lady Queene Mary, which happe as it is most heauy and grieuous vnto vs, so haue we no lesse cause an other way to reioyce with praise to almightie God, for that he hath left vnto vs a true, lawfull and right Inheritrice to the crowne of this Realme, which is the Lady Elizabeth second Daughter to our late souereigne Lord of noble memorie King Henry the eyght, and sister vnto our sayde late Queene, of whose most lawful, right and title in the succession to the crowne (thanks be to God) we neede not to doubt. Wherefore, the Lordes of this house haue determined with your assentes and consentes to passe from hence into the Palace, and there to proclayme the sayde Ladye Elizabeth Queene of this Realme, without farther tract of time. Wherevnto the whole house answered with euident apparaunce of ioy, cryng, God saue Queene Elizabeth, long may Queene Elizabeth raigne ouer vs. And so this parliament beyng dissolued by the act of God, the sayde Lordes immediatly calling vnto them the Kings and principall Heraults at Armes, went into the Palace of Westminster, and directly before the hall doore in the fore noone of the same day, after seuerall sounding of Trumpets made in most solempne maner, proclaymed the new Queene, by thys name and title. Elizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, defender of the faith. &c. to the great comfort and reioysing of the people, as by theyr manors and countenances well appered. After which proclamation made at Westminster, the sayd Lords with all speede repayred into the Citye of London, where like Proclamation was made in their presence at the the Crosse in Chepe, with no lesse vniuersall ioy, and thanks geuing to God of the hearers.

In this place I intende to conclude and ende thys my rude and vnlearned woorke, not worthye the name of a Chronicle, praying the gentle Reader to pardō me in that I do not passe forth with the declaration of the Historye of thys most gracious and vertuous Princes, in such maner as I haue done with other before, for diuers causes do moue me to stay here, not only for that my woorke alredy is come to a full volume, but also for that her graces proceedings in her gouernement bene such and so great as require a larger discourse of matter. As first to consider how her Maiestie finding this realme in hostilitie with Fraunce, with how great felicitie and no lesse prouidence of counsayle shee brought both realmes to peace. And the towne of Calice before lost (as you haue heard) in the time of hir sister, by an honorable peace concluded with the French king, shee brought to passe eyther to haue the same againe restored within a certayne time prefixed, or else the sayde French king to forfeyt and paye vnto her certaine great sommes of money, reseruing neuertheless the right and title of the sayde towne and countrie to the realme of Englande. And perceyuing that by the losse of the sayde towne and by other occasions this realme was much disfurnished of Armour and munition: She of her high pollecy and with no small charges prouided a new furniture & store thereof in a much more large proporcion. And in like maner espying in time the subtill compasse of the French king in landing of men of warre in Scotland, whereof might haue ensued perill of inuasion into England that way, did nobly & prudently preuent the same to the vtter frustration of all his fine and secrete deuises: besides the quayling and disappointing the house of Guyse, of their attemptes in Fraunce, tending to the vtter destruction of all such in that realme as would not professe the Popes religion, wherein if the late Duke had preuayled, it was not vnlike, but that he encoraged thereby, would haue made some further enterprise to the small quyet of this realme. Adde herevnto the benefite inestimable which this realme hath receiued by the conuerting of the base and copper monies into fine Siluer and Golde: but specially the most mercifull gouernement and rule sithens her comming to the state of Queene, wherin the euill doer hath not his free skope, nor the honest person kept from iustice: neyther yet any rigour or extremitie vsed in cases, though some of them haue nerely touched the suretie of her highnesse person.

These things I say with many other being of so great importaunce require to be handled in a higher maner of stile then is for me to write. And better is litle or nothing to be sayde by me in these and many other most honourable and Princely affayres, then for lacke of learning and eloquence in expressing, to darken or rather deface the excellencye of the same. And farther also, I am certified that there are sundrie men of excellent knowlege and learnyng, that purpose the setting forth of her highnesse Historye, so that dutie bindeth mee hauing respect vnto the honor of her Maiestie and this noble Realme of Englande here to stay, referryng the desirous Reader that wolde vnderstande such particuler thinges as haue passed in the time of her Graces reigne, vnto suche briefe notes as are set forth in the small Abridgements of Chronicles of our tyme.

And

And here most hartily beseeching Almightie God to preserue her Maiestie in most prosperous and honorable estate long to liue and reigne ouer vs, and also to keepe and preserue all her highnesse most honorable Counsellours and to prosper them in all their affayres both publique and priuate. I finishe and make an ende in the yere of our Lord 1568. the .xviij. day of Marche and in the .xj. yere of the reigne of this most noble and vertuous Princesse Elizabeth our most dread and soueraigne Lady.

FINIS.

A Table declaring the reignes of euerie king of this Realme, ſithen the conqueſt, and the yeares of our Lorde, and Monethes and dayes of their beginning, and alſo the names and ſurnames of all the Maiors, and Shirifes of London, with the yere and daye of their entrance into their charge. And for the better vnderſtanding of this Table, the ſame is deuided into iiij. partes or titles. The firſt is the yeres of our Lorde, then the Monethes and dayes wherein euery King began his reigne, then the yeres of the Kings reigne, and laſtly, the names of the Bayliffes, Shirifes and Maiors, placed iuſtly vppon the verie day of the Moneth, wherin euerie of them entred into their office. And for example, I would know in what yere of our Lorde King Henrie the. viij. began his reigne, and in what Moneth and daye, and who were then Bayliffes and Maior of London. Firſt I ſeeke out among the Kinges, and at the laſt, I finde King Henrie the. viij. and in the firſt title I finde the yeare of our Lorde that he began his reigne in, which was. 1509. and the. xxij. day of the Moneth of Aprill. And immediatly followeth the Moneth of September, and the. xxviij. daye, wherein George Monmour and John Dudley entred into their office of Shirifwikrie, and likewyſe foloweth in the ſame yere the Moneth of October the. xxviij. day, wherin Thomas Wyatuirie entred into his office of the Mayraltie of London. And thus may ye in like maner find a true accompt of the yeres of any King, Shirife, or Maior of London.
